PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 97th CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

SENATE—Monday, January 25, 1982

The 25th day of January being the day prescribed by House Joint Resolution 377 for the meeting of the 2d session of the 97th Congress, the Senate assembled in its Chamber at the Capitol, at 12 o'clock meridian,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will please come to order. The Chaplain will offer the prayer.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, LL.D., D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

May we spend a few moments in silent prayer remembering the families of those who lost loved ones in the air crash just a week and a half ago.

(Moment of silence.)

Lord God, our Heavenly Father—Worthy art Thou, to receive glory and honour and power for Thou hast created all things, and for Thy pleasure they are and were created.—Revelation 4: 11.

Blessed be the name of God for ever and ever: for wisdom and might are His; and He changeth the times and seasons. He removeth kings and setteth up kings. He giveth wisdom unto the wise, and knowledge to them that know understanding.—Daniel 2: 20-21.

Gracious, forgiving God, adult pride forbids New Year's resolutions; they were for earlier, immature years. But as we enter a new year, we cannot escape the desire for change. Help us Lord to keep faith with our determination to be better and do better.

We thank Thee for Thy love, for Thy Son's sacrifice, and for amazing grace that forgives sin and failure, enabling us to face the future freed from guilt and unimpeded by past mistakes. Awaken, dear God, the best that is in each of us and make the influence of the Senate to the Nation and the world one of unity, integrity and justice.

We pray this in the name of Thy dear Son. Amen.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, there are resolutions at the desk that I ask the Chair now to lay before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the first resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 280) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

S. RES. 280

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled and that the Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Pursuant to the resolution just agreed to, the Chair appoints the majority leader and the minority leader to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to inform the President of the United States that a quorum of the Senate is assembled.

NOTIFICATION TO THE HOUSE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will now read the second resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 281) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

S. RES. 281

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will now read the third resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 282) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

S. RES. 282

Resolved, That the hour of daily meeting of the Senate be 12 o'clock meridian unless otherwise ordered.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE APPOINTED TO NOTIFY THE PRESIDENT

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, in accordance with the order of the Senate, the distinguished minority leader and I have acted as a committee to inform the President of the United States that a quorum has assembled in the Senate, that we are ready to do business, and to hear any message which he wished to convey to the Senate.

He conveyed the message that he would be reporting to a joint session of Congress tomorrow evening on the state of the Union.

HOUR OF CONVENING ON TUESDAY, THURSDAY, AND MONDAY—JOINT SESSION TUESDAY—JOINT MEETING THURSDAY

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today it stand in recess until the hour of 8:15 p.m. on Tuesday, January 26, 1982; and that, at the hour of 8:40 p.m. on that day, the Senate proceed as a body to the Chamber of the House of Representatives for the purpose of hearing the state of the Union address by the President of the United States; and that upon conclusion of that address the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 10 a.m. on Thursday, January 28.

I further ask unanimous consent that at the hour of 10:40 a.m., on Thursday, the Senate proceed as a body to the Chamber of the House of Representatives for the purpose of attending a joint meeting in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, and that at that time the Senate stand in recess over until the hour of 12 noon on Monday, February 1, 1982.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, let me inquire. Will there be any time for morning business after today? Some of us have sort of come back from home with a few things on our mind, having conferred with the people. We would like to have a little morning business involved somewhere in this, but we are not prepared today. As I see it, we are going to come together on Tuesday night and then not until Thursday. Is it possible to do a little arranging before long to have a period, a short period, for morning business?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I would say to the distinguished Senator from Alabama that there will be a period for the transaction of routine morning business today. It is not my intention to ask unanimous consent that there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business on other days this week. It is the tradition of the Senate that no business is transacted by the Senate other than the introduction of bills, resolutions, memorials, petitions, and the making of statements prior to the President's state of the Union address. The morning business time provided for today will, of course, accommodate those purposes.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the Senator will yield, if we are prepared. Some of us have been without secretarial help and we would like to have a little preparation time prior to our statements. Sometimes our extemporaneous statements come back to haunt us. Therefore, it is wise, sometimes, to give a little careful thought to some of the remarks we might make.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I must say the Senator from Alabama came back with a laudable but uncharacteristic modesty in that respect. [Laughter.]

I have never known him to feel regret or remorse at anything he has ever uttered, either in a prepared statement or in an extemporaneous one. If the Senator from Alabama wants to provide for a time for the transaction of routine morning business on Thursday, after the time of convening of the session for the commemoration of the Roosevelt birthday, I would be prepared to consult with him on it. At this time, Mr. President, I would not wish to change my request.

Mr. HEFLIN. What is the chance if I withdraw my opposition?

Mr. BAKER. I would hope that the Senator from Alabama would now withdraw his objection, if indeed he has made an objection.

Mr. HEFLIN. I just wondered whether or not it could be worked out, whether or not it is possible to have it on Wednesday.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I would hope that the Senator would not object to this request. The general design of this schedule, as I am sure the Senator can see, is to have any routine business this week and to do nothing of a significant nature before we proceed to the business of next week. However, I am perfectly prepared to provide for time, generous time, for the transaction of routine morning business on Thursday.

Mr. HEFLIN. While I have questions about my own personal situation, I will yield and give into the wisdom of the majority leader, which prevails like Ivory soap, about 99.44 percent of the time. I yield to him and withdraw any objection I might make.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, now that the request is granted, I must say to the Senator from Alabama that after hearing the eloquence of his concern, I am tempted to make the first order of business in this session the quota system so that he may not return to his own State of Alabama more often than necessary. Otherwise, this sort of inspiration may be the rule rather than the exception.

RECORD OPEN UNTIL 3 P.M., TODAY

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent for two things: First, that Members may have until 3 o'clock this afternoon to submit statements or introduce bills, petitions, memorials, or joint resolutions to be included in the RECORD or to be received for the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER DESIGNATING PERIOD FOR TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS ON THURSDAY AND FOR RECORD TO REMAIN OPEN UNTIL 5 P.M.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate convenes on Thursday at 10 a.m., there be a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business to extend not past the hour of 10:40 a.m. and in which Senators may speak for not more than 10 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the distinguished majority leader yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the distinguished majority leader also provide that Senators may have until 3, 4, or 5 o'clock on Thursday in which to insert statements into the RECORD?

Mr. BAKER. Yes; I ask unanimous consent that Senators may have until 5 p.m. on Thursday in which to introduce statements, bills, resolutions, or memorials.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair and I thank the Senator from Alabama.

SENATE AGENDA

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if I could have the attention of Senators, I would like to outline the schedule of the Senate as I see it in the next few days and next few weeks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will please be in order.

The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, first of all, may I say that as a continuation of our policy of last session, it will be the intention of the leadership to target for a 6 o'clock recess or adjournment time, except on Thursdays, and if a late session of the Senate is necessary, Thursday will be chosen as the night when Members should be on notice of that possibility. Every effort will be made, absent extraordinary circumstances, to convene the Senate at a reasonable hour and to complete our business by 6 or 6:30 p.m. on days other than Thursdays. Thursdays may, indeed, be late days.

CONSIDERATION OF RESOLUTION RELATING TO SENATOR WILLIAMS

Mr. President, on Tuesday, February 2, at 2 p.m., it is the intention of the leadership to ask the Senate to turn to the consideration of Senate Resolution 204, the resolution of the Ethics Committee in respect to Senator HARRISON A. WILLIAMS, JR., of New Jersey.

Following that, assuming that the Senate agrees to proceed to the consideration of that item at that time, it would be the intention of the leadership to follow generally the Mansfield pattern, which was adopted during the consideration of another disciplinary case. Briefly put, that means that committees would not meet, other business would not be transacted, and the Senate would continue on this measure until it was completed. It would be the intention of the leadership to ask the Senate to convene at 10:30 a.m. on those days, or earlier—but 10:30 absent other circumstances which would dictate a different hour—which would give committees then, under the rule, until 12:30 p.m. in which to meet. Committees should be on notice that objection will be made by the leadership to requests to extend the time for the sitting of committees beyond the time allowed under the rule, which is to say 2 hours after the convening hour.

At 12:30, the Senate then would proceed to the consideration of the Williams resolution until the matter is disposed of. A live quorum would be the first order of business. Senators are urged to be present so that a quorum can be established as soon as possible. It would be the intention of the leadership to proceed with the Williams debate from such time after 12:30 as a quorum is established until about 6 p.m. on each day, with the exception of Thursday which, as I indicated earlier, would be perhaps a late day.

There are certain committees, Mr. President, which have the authority to meet notwithstanding the session of the Senate: The Appropriations Committee, the Budget Committee, and I believe the Intelligence Committee. I ask that the chairman and the ranking member of each of those committees consider favorably the request of the leadership that they not avail themselves of that option and opportunity during the time of debate on Senate Resolution 204.

(Later, the following occurred:)

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, earlier, I misspoke myself when I said that the Appropriations Committee and the Budget Committee and the Intelligence Committee had standing authority to meet. I am told by the Parliamentarian that that is the Appropriations Committee, the Budget Committee, and the Ethics Committee. I correct my statement in that respect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I observe that the chairman of the Ethics Committee and the vice chairman of the Ethics Committee are present on the floor. I invite them to make such statements as they may wish at this time in respect of the management of that debate.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader.

I find that the format which he has suggested is perfectly satisfactory, I think, to both the vice chairman and myself.

Mr. President, I genuinely urge Senators to be present on a matter so serious as that and to treat it with the dignity that is necessary. I do not think anybody is going to like it. I know nobody is going to like it. But it is the obligation of the Senate to look after itself and it can only be done by Senators who arrive with it in mind to fulfill that obligation.

I thank the majority leader. I assume that we shall take the details of who sits on the floor and other things during that moment.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator. I observe the presence of the distinguished Senator from Hawaii. I yield to him now if he wishes to speak on this schedule of arrangements.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader for the schedule. It meets all the necessary requirements.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I yield now to the vice chairman of the committee.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I think the schedule is good and the statements of the chairman are good statements and the statement by the distinguished Senator from Hawaii is a good statement. I agree with them.

I understand that there will probably be an objection to a time limitation. This has been discussed generally, not from Senator WILLIAMS or from the Ethics Committee, but generally from statements. I think that we shall have to give some thought as to the handling of this. The Ethics Committee was unanimous in its report and, therefore, the normal partisan approach will not be present here. It could well be that if there is any management of time or management of this, it ought to be done on a fairness basis with, perhaps, the distinguished Senator from Hawaii being in position. It could well be that some ground rules ought to be established in regard to this, since there could be some differences from the normal procedure. I suggest that the majority leader, the minority leader, the distinguished Senator from Hawaii, and the chairman of the Ethics Committee at least meet and anticipate, if possible, any procedural problems and try to come to some agreement in regard to those matters.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. I agree with his statement and I think his suggestion is well taken. I hope that the chairman and the vice chairman of the Ethics Committee might meet with Senator INOUYE and others and apprise the joint leadership, Senator ROBERT C. BYRD and me, of any recommendations he may make or may agree on with respect to physical arrangement of the Chamber and any other arrangements that may be dealt with prior to that debate.

OTHER ITEMS FOR EARLY CONSIDERATION

Mr. President, in addition to the Williams debate, it is the intention of the leadership early in the session, perhaps as soon as immediately after the Williams debate, although that is not certain at this point, to turn to the consideration of S. Res. 20, providing for television coverage of Senate proceedings. I understand that is a very controversial issue and some Senators wish to be notified of the exact time of that resolution. I shall make sure that the announcement is made well in advance so that no Senator may be taken by surprise. I shall make an effort to apprise those who wrote particular letters to me in this matter.

In addition to these two items, it is the intention of the leadership to ask the Senate to resume consideration of the State-Justice-Commerce appropriations bill at some point early in the session. That bill carries a prayer-in-public-schools amendment which has been offered by the distinguished Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS), on which cloture occurred shortly before the session ended last year.

Mr. President, I expect that, in addition to that, an early item to be dealt with will be the proposal for the extension of the Voting Rights Act; the Department of Justice authorization bill, which will carry the Johnston amendment, on which there is an order for a vote, and other items that I hope we can turn to early in the session, but this list is not an exclusive list by any means; S. 1080, the regulatory reform bill; S. 391, the agent identities bill; a Clean Air Act extension or revision; and perhaps a debate on the abortion issue.

While the leadership asked the Senate to postpone the debate on those issues last year until the end of the year, which was done, by and large, I think the better interests of the Senate and of the Senators would be served by addressing those issues early in this session if, indeed, they are to be debated at length.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE ON TAX EXEMPTION STATUS FOR DISCRIMINATORY INSTITUTIONS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I yield now to the distinguished Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE).

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. DOLE. I missed the first few minutes of the session. Will we be in session again on Wednesday of this week?

Mr. BAKER. We will not be in session on Wednesday.

Mr. DOLE. On Thursday?

Mr. BAKER. We will meet on Thursday.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I may not be able to complete some work on a bill that has been sent up by the President in reference to tax exemption for that question on racial discrimination. I shall be having a meeting at 2 o'clock. I am not certain I shall be able to make a judgment before the 3 o'clock request of the Senator. I assume that I shall be introducing it by request, I think Thursday, with the accommodation of almost anyone who has an interest in that if it can be done today, adhering to the schedule for next Monday. I know there is interest—Senator THURMOND has indicated some interest. I think, frankly, it is a tax issue, but I also think it is potentially a can of worms, so we are anxious to get started on it.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Kansas. I was about to say that another item on the agenda that should, in my opinion, be dealt with soon is the so-called tax exemption issue procedure just described by the Senator from Kansas. I understand that there is a desire by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary to request a joint referral of that bill. The message was referred to the Finance Committee, and I shall consult with both the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance and the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary before the introduction of that bill on Thursday so we can try to arrange a satisfactory solution.

It is the intention of the leadership, however, to deal with this issue as soon as possible, Mr. President.

There are other items that will, no doubt, be available and properly come before the Senate. As an example, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary has just indicated to me that the criminal code revision and recodification will be reported to the Senate today and will be eligible for consideration at an early point. I hope we can deal with that reasonably soon.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have spoken far beyond the time allocated to the two leaders, and I appreciate the forebearance of the distinguished minority leader from bringing that to my attention or the attention of the Senate. At this point, I am prepared to yield the floor.

Before I do so, however, Mr. President, I inquire whether there is an order for morning business today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader will be recognized following the comments of the majority leader. Then, under the previous order, there will be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to exceed 30 minutes, with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

RECOGNITION OF THE MINORITY LEADER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader for his comprehensive statement laying out the program for the next few days. It will be helpful to all of us.

I have nothing to say at this time, Mr. President. I yield such time as is under my control to the Senator from Montana. Then, in turn, he may yield any remaining time to the Senator from Arkansas (Mr. PRYOR), and then to the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. PROXMIRE).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BAUCUS. I thank the minority leader.

Mr. President, I inquire how much time the minority leader has under the standing order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority leader has 10 minutes.

Mr. BAUCUS. I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. BAUCUS in connection with the introduction of legislation are printed under Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.)

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I appreciate the distinguished Senator from Montana yielding to me.

Mr. President, how much time still remains under the time allocation to the minority leader?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A total of 10 minutes is allocated. Only 2 minutes have been used.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from Arkansas if he has need for more time than that.

Mr. PRYOR. I would appreciate about 12 minutes, if I might be accorded that period of time.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from Arkansas would be agreeable to the unanimous-consent request that his time now remaining by allocation of the minority leader be added to the time he would have under the morning business order, and that would give him a total of 13 minutes.

Mr. PRYOR. That would be an adequate amount of time. I do want to say to my distinguished colleague that the Senator from Wisconsin, I understand, wishes to make some remarks shortly. That will be perfectly satisfactory to me.

Mr. BAKER. Will the Senator from Wisconsin have any difficulty with that time under the transaction of routine morning business?

Mr. PROXMIRE. If I have 12 minutes, that will be fine, if that would suit the majority leader.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time for the transaction of routine morning business be extended from 30 minutes to 1 hour; and I ask unanimous consent that the time in which Senators may speak be extended from 5 minutes to 15 minutes each.

I may say parenthetically to Senators that if that does not serve the purpose, we will extend it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am perfectly happy to put us in morning business at this time, if the Senator from Arkansas wishes. That might be the simplest way to handle the matter, if that is agreeable to the minority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes. Would the distinguished majority leader provide that there will be no interruption?

Mr. BAKER. Yes.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that no interruption appear in the statement to be made by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, I sincerely appreciate the majority leader accommodating our request.

Mr. BAKER. Will the Senator permit us, then, to go into morning business?

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, during which Senators will be recognized for a period not to exceed 15 minutes each, and the total period not to exceed 1 hour.

The Senator from Arkansas.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, on numerous occasions in the past, a number of my colleagues and I have addressed the Senate on the conditions developing in rural America.

Today, I shall talk about the crisis of agriculture in the heartland of America.

The American farmer is facing disaster. This crisis is the worst since the Great Depression of the 1930's. Our farmers are literally "drying up on the vine." And we must heed these danger signals now. We must be willing to make necessary adjustments if the American farmer is destined to survive. These measures, Mr. President, must immediately bring some kind of predictability—and stability—back to this most basic backbone of our economy. These next 12 months could be the most critical in recent history for agriculture in general—and for the many thousands of farmers across the land, and the millions in America who depend upon the farmer for our very existence.

I am sure that during this past recess period other farm State Senators were made as vividly aware of the impending crisis as I am.

I had the opportunity to visit with many of the farmers of Arkansas—the large and small, the efficient, the inefficient, the young and old—and the situation everywhere was the same: "I cannot survive under the present conditions," each of them said in his own way, "and I see no hope of things getting better. I cannot receive in the marketplace enough to cover my costs of production."

I realize times are hard. They are hard in every segment of our economy. But agriculture is unique. It is that one basic enterprise that reaches into every sector of this country's economy. It affects every citizen. Its health or sickness is a mirror of our country's financial state. And while its condition is now one of pain, I firmly believe that once agriculture regains its balance and gets on its feet, it will lead this country back to more prosperous times.

For years this country's agriculture communities have sacrificed for the betterment of the entire country. They were some of the first to call for a balanced Federal budget, to make an appeal for fewer Government regulations, to be willing to participate in more Federal budget cuts. They were even among the first to allow their livelihood—in the form of agricultural commodities—to be used as a tool in national policy decisions.

Today our farmers are the most efficient and productive in the world. We now produce 3 times more during each work hour than in 1960 and 12 times more than in 1930.

And yet because of this prosperity they find themselves asking the basic question today, "Can I continue in my chosen livelihood?" Many are answering, "No." There is a rapidly growing number of farmers in Arkansas who live on the brink of economic collapse. Foreclosure has become a daily threat. And money that used to support families is now going to pay exorbitant interest rates. From 1973 to 1979, short-term interest expenses rose 300 percent nationwide—from $2.2 billion to $6.6 billion. And mortgage interest expenses rose about 250 percent—from $2.5 billion to $6.3 billion. In 1979, interest charges per acre were 400 percent higher than in 1967. The American Farm Bureau estimated last year that the current earnings from 4 acres of land are needed to pay the mortgages interest on 1 acre of newly purchased land. Interest expense now accounts for about 20 percent of all production expenses. And each percent of higher interest adds about $1.6 billion in interest costs to farmers.

The farm bill of 1981 was constructed last year in an atmosphere charged with tension and uncertainty. Congress was caught between the Reagan administration's mandate to cut Federal spending—and, on the other hand, the demands of the farmer for increased income protection. The Conference Committee finally reported a bill back to both Houses after weeks of strenuous debate. And yet, even then, the bill was not what most farmers wanted, needed, or deserved.

With reservation, I supported this year's farm bill, Mr. President. I think it was all that we could have achieved at the time it was drafted. I think the new farm bill does attempt to give the farmer a cushion against total economic collapse. At the same time, it also gives this administration—and the Secretary of Agriculture—the tools to help pave the way for a return to profitability in farming. Much of this is accomplished through the Secretary's broadened discretionary authority. I feel the Senate and the entire country, including our farmers, all have an obligation to continue to see that a sound fiscal and monetary philosophy is maintained. We must restore hope to the farmer. We must also guide our economy so that the farmer's costs of input—his fuel, fertilizer, chemicals, machinery, even his interest rates—are slowed down and his markets will provide him a profit.

We must encourage the President and his administration to return the United States to a position of strength as a primary supplier to the world. In this connection, we have suggested that President Reagan appoint a farmer or a small businessman to the Federal Reserve Board when the next vacancy occurs. It is crucial, I think, that we hear directly from these important yet often forgotten members of American society.

We must intensify our export programs for agricultural commodities to international markets, and not remain simply a residual supplier as we have been in the past several years. Our farmers continue to produce more than we can consume domestically. Our Government programs and philosophy have encouraged planting "fence-row-to-fence-row." But, the fact is, the farmer today is a victim of his own efficiency. Therefore, agricultural exports are critical to the well-being of American farmers. Our Government's past embargoes have sent clear signals to countries abroad that the United States is not a reliable supplier. These countries, in turn, have then geared their agricultural productions to take up the slack created from the stoppage of American grain. And meanwhile these markets have been lost to American producers. It will be very difficult to get them back.

We desperately need this administration to make strong statements in support of the American farmer.

Those individuals who produce food and fiber must be given the opportunity of being a primary and reliable supplier who will not be in the market one day and out the next. We must have free and unrestrained access to the markets of the world. The mere mention of grain embargoes to Poland and the Soviet Union sends shudders through the commodity market. This psychological impact is real. Ask any farmer who tries to sell in these depressed markets. We must continue to see that other countries do not unduly subsidize their agricultural products at the expense of our American products. The GATT agreements must be enforced to allow our markets to operate.

On many occasions the Members of both the Senate and House have been called upon to look for new and innovative ways to help our American farmers. And along with other Members of the Senate I have cosponsored legislation that should help our farmers. This includes the following:

First, an amendment to the Export-Import Bank Act that allows agricultural products to be sold with 10¾ percent interest * * * with earmarks on some of these funds for the exclusive use of agriculture.

Second, a bill to stop the European export community from subsidizing their agricultural commodities at an unfair disadvantage to American agricultural commodities.

Third, a curtailment to the power of the President to call an embargo on agricultural products alone; and with this, a call for a greater voice by Congress in such decisions.

These are positive steps taken to aid our farmers. But we need others to be taken by the administration. In the next few days, Secretary Block will have a chance to exercise a measure of his new discretionary authority granted by the new farm bill. I wish to propose how he might use this authority.

Mr. President, I propose to Secretary Block and this body the following:

10-POINT PROGRAM

1. Provisions for an acreage reduction program that will help put supply more in balance with demand. If my meetings with farmers had a common theme, it would have to have been for an acreage reduction program that has incentives for maximum producer participation. To achieve this maximum participation, I would hope that the Secretary would:

(a) Require all producers who want to be eligible for 1982's price support programs to participate.

(b) That they be required to reduce their 1982 crops acreage based upon last season's certified area or the average of the past 2 years, whichever is larger.

(c) Allow hayed, grazed acreage, or clean fallow land to count as part of the required reduction, without making conservation practices mandatory.

(d) Do not require offsetting compliance between crops and on separate farms owned by the same individual.

By setting minimum and maximum ranges, I propose that USDA would conduct a cost/benefit study to determine what percent of reduction might be required to achieve maximum benefits of producer participation.

I further hope all agricultural lenders would encourage their borrowers to participate. At the same time, I hope this administration would not structure a program that would encourage nonparticipation simply to drastically reduce potential budget exposure from deficiency payments.

For example, an effective acreage reduction program of 15 to 20 percent for the 1982 rice crop would be estimated to make a price difference of $11 per hundredweight (with a reduction program) and below $9 per hundredweight (with no reduction program). The potential savings to the fiscal year 1983 Government outlays for price deficiency payments could amount to $300 million.

2. Make all 1982 crop rice eligible for CCC loan. This requires new legislation that I will be prepared to introduce. Less than 45 percent of the rice producers are now eligible for the loan on 1981 rice. (only 27 percent in Arkansas.) This ineligibility is not the fault of our farmers. It is due to the outdated allotment system which will cease to exist with the 1982 crop under our new farm bill. This would give value to the rice now stored on our farms. And it would not be costly in terms of Government outlays. The loan could be made recourse rather than nonrecourse.

3. Ask the Secretary to seriously consider the establishment of a farmer-owned reserve for rice. I would recommend the reserve have:

(a) Entry loan of at least $8.50 per hundredweight;

(b) First year interest free;

(c) Seventy-five cents per hundredweight annual storage payment, and

(d) Release price of $11.21 per hundredweight (8.01 loan rate times 140 percent).

4. Commodity Credit Corporation—Korea has bought little U.S. rice from our 1981 crop. I would propose that we offer them a credit package of $300 million to Korea if it will buy up to 1 million tons from our 1981 crop with 25 percent being from the South.

5. Public Law 480 program—Very little of the fiscal year 1982 rice program allocation has been programed. I hope the President would put a stop to the interagency wrangling that we see occurring and let us get the program allocated. At the same time, I would further recommend that 20 percent of the allocation in Public Law 480 be used for poultry products. They are having a tremendous problem depleting their surplus supplies.

FARMERS HOME ADMINISTRATION

6. Economic Emergency Loan authority that expired September 30, 1981, which was authorized by title II of Public Law 95-334 should be extended to permit bonafide farmers to obtain sufficient financing through fiscal year 1982 or possibly over a longer period.

Due to high production costs and continued low prices for agricultural commodities some farmers will be unable to obtain 1982 financing from their regular credit sources. This will include several presently indebted FmHA borrowers that do not qualify for continued FmHA credit assistance under other FmHA loan authorities and FmHA regulations.

There are many bonafide farmers in Arkansas that cannot continue farming even with the extended Economic Emergency Loan authority unless interest rates are reduced substantially.

There should be authority under the Economic Emergency program to totally refinance both chattel and real estate indebtedness to present creditors if a sound loan can be developed and if there is reasonable prospect for success for the farmer.

Unless the interest rates on all FmHA loans are reduced substantially and farmers are not assured of a reasonable margin of profit for their commodities bonafide farmers in Arkansas and throughout this country will be substantially reduced by the end of crop year 1983.

Further, in order for the FmHA to efficiently administer farm programs and maintain the level in other programs administered by FmHA the temporary emergency loan employees must be maintained. In Arkansas there are 92 emergency loan employees. These people do most of the leg work in processing farm loans. If these people are terminated, it will have a negative impact on farmers receiving FmHA assistance. Lengthy delays in processing farm loans will result due to FmHA shortage of personnel. Furthermore, if these temporary emergency loan personnel are terminated it will result in possible additional losses to the Government, since these people are also critical in supervising and servicing of farmer program loans. In Arkansas, there is approximately $700 to $800 million in farm loans outstanding through the FmHA.

7. Agricultural Research and Cooperative Extension Service:

Mr. President, research and the dissemination of its information is vital to production agriculture. Over the last several years, we have not appropriated the funds that can adequately provide our land-grant institutions the ability to conduct the applied research that is necessary to help provide our farmers with new and innovative information. I would hope that we can start to put more of USDA's budget in applied agricultural research and put less emphasis on the nonfarmer programs within USDA. Further, I would hope that this Congress would more closely monitor the current and future research projects to insure they are directed to cost-efficient projects that can be applied to today's and tomorrow's agriculture.

8. I would also propose the acceleration in the review process of doing away with the overburdening of Government rules and regulations that in many cases has sapped some of the efficiency from this industry. Government must become more efficient.

9. I would propose that this Congress appropriate the one-time funding for the Agricultural Export Credit Revolving Fund that will help stimulate expansion of farm exports. This program required only the one-time appropriation since principal and interest repayment to the fund will generate money for future loans.

Mr. President, the time is growing short for many of America's farmers. This Congress and this administration must realize what the impact to this country's total economy will be if we allow agriculture to remain in its present state.

10. Accordingly, President Reagan should now heed the advice of the farm bill conferees and call a White House conference to explore new solutions to the national farm crisis. I must direct the conference to be serious in its deliberations, and above all be honest to our farmers. They have had enough posturing and rhetoric. So, once again, I call for us to go forward and bring this basic industry back to a position of profitability and stability.

Let us remember President Reagan's own words when he signed the 1981 farm bill—

Working together, sensitive to the needs of each other in the marketplace, we can help our farmers and America survive.

The farming industry is the right place to start. And we must begin now, before it is too late.

MARY McGRORY ON SENATOR DENTON

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, no one can write a more devastating indictment of coldness and lack of compassion than Mary McGrory. Her deep and passionate commitment to a break for the losers of this world comes through in just about every line she writes. Sometimes she seems to have a burning contempt for the indifferent rich, and for the privileged who have little or no sense of social concern. Mary McGrory's column on Senator DENTON that appeared in the December 17 Washington Post disclosed a perception that few, if any of us, can achieve. Many of us fall into the trap of characterizing the people we encounter in life—especially public figures—as either good or bad, gleaming with righteousness or as black-hearted, self-serving and evil.

Anyone who has read Mary McGrory for a few years, and who has followed the career of Senator JEREMIAH DENTON would hardly expect the kind of smashing surprise of that column. It is something else. It gives us an insight as to this outstanding Senator from Alabama.

The column represents a credit to both of these remarkable human beings, Mary McGrory and Senator DENTON. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the column ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Dec. 7, 1981]

JEREMIAH DENTON'S OTHER SIDE: HE CARES ABOUT THE BORN, TOO

(By Mary McGrory)

He is so identified with the cause of the unborn that Sen. Jeremiah Denton (R-Ala.) seems to epitomize the gibe by Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.) that "conservatives' concern for children begins with conception and ends with birth."

Denton's stand against free choice and free sex have made him an ogre to the National Organization for Women and other feminist and liberal organizations. His sponsorship of what was known as "the teen-age chastity" bill occasioned many snickers, although the final product, a compromise named "Adolescent Family Life," won the endorsement of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.).

Denton's unguarded remark during a hearing on a bill about spousal rape—"Dammit, when you get married, you kind of expect you're going to get a little sex"—produced more laughter inside the Senate and out and fresh outcries from the women's groups.

But there's another side to Denton, one that sets him apart from the cardboard Moral Majoritarians who abound in the new Senate. He spoke of John F. Kennedy on November 22, the anniversary of his assassination. In advance, Denton paid a call on Kennedy's brother to ask formal permission and to show him the text of the speech. John Kennedy is a hero to Denton, a retired admiral regarded as a hero himself, having spent seven years and seven months as a prisoner of the North Vietnamese.

Denton protests that he cares about the born, too, and that his efforts on their behalf have been lost in the hullabaloo over his nay-saying on abortion and sex. He doubled funds proposed by President Reagan for adoptions and battered children. He managed the bill for aging Americans.

Most recently, he championed a group for which your standard right-winger has no time—American children, those of Asian women and U.S. servicemen. These children are not wanted here and are regarded as undesirable in their native countries.

To Denton, trying to give the little outcasts a chance to come here is a logical extension of his publicized exertions on sexual morality.

"I am not a sex prude, I'm not a hard-nosed hawk," Denton says. "What I do, I do for children. They are the victims of permissiveness. Look at battered children. A promiscuous mother has many boyfriends. Inevitably one of them resents the child's father and beats up the child."

"Anyone who knows me knows I am a compassionate individual. I always have been. I was president of my class, all the way through school, and you can't be elected unless people sense you are compassionate.

"In Mobile, when I got out of the cooler [POW camp], they printed a whole lot of stories, which I had forgotten. One girl I went to high school with said she would never forget me. She was so fat, she couldn't lean over to tie her shoes. I tied them for her."

The man who tied the fat girl's shoes is, he insists, trying to make life easier for children who are the casualties of America's sexual revolution, which erupted while he was imprisoned. He was captured in 1965, when Playboy magazine was at the boundary of public acceptance; he was liberated in 1972, into a world of massage parlors, group sex and Playgirl magazine.

He says he isn't intolerant. He insists he is a survival-oriented person who worries equally about the imbalance in strategic forces and the imbalance in the way we treat our children—"throwing them into tot-lots and giving them television as a sitter."

Jody Darragh, a former Eastern Airlines stewardess who flew mercy missions to Indochina and was assigned as Denton's escort when he finally returned to the United States, brought the plight of the Amerasian children to his attention, and he embraced it with his usual ardor.

To bring such children out of Vietnam, where there are thousands, some contact obviously would be necessary with the Vietnamese government, which we do not recognize.

The idea of recognition does not outrage Denton.

"If it was our policy, and we got something in return, I would not be opposed just because of my experiences there," he says.

"But I want you to hear this carefully: I did not will it as a prisoner [that] my government should end the war to get us out. I didn't value my own life as a blue chip in exchange for the 17 million people in south Vietnam, who would be subjugated to communist tyranny. So I wouldn't be a leader, for recognition just to get accountability on our MIAs or to get these children out. But I wouldn't object on the grounds of what I went through there. I am not a vindictive man."

That self-judgment is confirmed by many who deal with Denton. He is a man of draining intensity. When he talks about immorality and military unpreparedness and the horrors of communism, the two lines perpendicular to his eyebrows deepen to the point where they almost split his forehead. But when the matter is not cosmic, his manner has much warmth and sweetness.

He's for the MX, nerve gas production, AWACS, all the standard "right" things. But he's for compassion, too, and that's more than you can say for the rightwingers with whom he travels and votes in the Senate.

IS THE UNITED STATES DISARMING UNILATERALLY?

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, as we all know—things are not always what they seem.

Take for example, the defense program.

Now we all have seen how record amounts of money are going to be spent rearming this Nation, and we certainly have all seen the massive cuts that have been made in other budget areas to accommodate this goal.

But an article that appeared recently in the January 10 edition of the Washington Post makes me wonder.

That article claims that in spite of all that talk about strengthening the national defense, there actually has been a "significant reduction in strategic nuclear weapons on alert as well as in the development of new weapons for the future."

Here is the evidence cited by Walter Pincus, the article's author:

This country had only 31 ballistic missile submarines in operation beginning October 1, which is 8 less than in 1980—and 10 fewer than we were permitted under the SALT I arms limitation agreement with Russia.

There are no plans to speedup in production of the D5 Trident II missile, which is a key element in the Administration's strategic battle plan for the future.

A drastic cutback in the number of MX missiles—slicing former President Carter's 200 MX missile arsenal to 100. By 1988, only 40 will be in silos.

Only one American B-52 with air-launched cruise missiles was ready to fly as of last September, with the first squadron not to be ready until December. Yet, the squadron was supposed to be on alert last September.

One-third of our country's land-based nuclear explosive capability—"sitting on aging, Titan II missiles—has been earmarked for retirement beginning next year." According to Mr. Pincus, this is way ahead of the time when the MX replacement missiles will be ready—1986.

What does the administration have to say about all this?

In response published in the January 18 edition of the Washington Post, Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger said:

The "significant reduction" to which he (Pincus) refers is the administration's plan to retire Titan missiles first deployed some 20 years ago and to continue the planned phase-out of the Polaris missiles now approaching the end of their useful life. Neither of these obsolete systems contributes enough to the security of our strategic deterrent to justify the increasing cost of maintaining them. And unlike the Carter Administration, we do not feel bound to retain in the inventory weapons that are militarily ineffective and costly to maintain merely to convey the hollow appearance of a strategic force more formidable than we actually possess.

But other defense experts think there is still plenty of usefulness left in some of the weapons that the administration is so eager to discard. And it is truly ironic that this "throw it all away—it's obsolete anyhow" attitude comes in the midst of the huge Defense Department budget increases we all have witnessed.

After all, is this not what we have heard for justifying the decision to reactivate several World War II battleships? The Navy argues that these old battlewagons have many years of useful life; that a change in mission can extend their usefulness; that they can be upgraded electronically to make them a viable weapon system.

While I disagree with this logic, based as it is on a lack of appreciation of Soviet cruise missile technology and the increasing vulnerability of large vessels, I cannot help but note the irony of an administration disregarding "old" strategic weapons while strongly supporting the resurrection of "old" conventional systems.

I urge the administration to reconsider some of these decisions. With the Russians superior to our country in the numerical size of their strategic weapons arsenal, we should make every attempt to find secondary, yet useful roles for existing equipment in order to provide more security for the United States.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the Walter Pincus article in the Washington Post on January 10, 1982, and the Caspar Weinberger rebuttal on January 17 be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BEHIND REAGAN'S TOUGH TALK, A UNILATERAL ARMS REDUCTION

(By Walter Pincus)

Of all the political axioms of Washington, one we often forget is to "watch what they do, not what they say." This is particularly worth remembering today in the area of national defense.

President Reagan, Defense Secretary Weinberger and others have, of course, been saying a great deal about defense, and the President no doubt will speak again in his State of the Union address about how determined he is to strengthen our military capability.

Those who watch instead of listen, however, will make an intriguing discovery: The Reagan administration in the past year actually presided over a significant reduction in strategic nuclear weapons on alert as well as in the development of new weapons for the future.

Item: Beginning Oct. 1, the United States had only 31 ballistic missile submarines in operation, eight less than the year before and 10 fewer than allowed under the SALT I arms limitation agreement with the Soviet Union.

Item: There was but one American B52 armed with air-launched Cruise missiles which was ready to fly as of last Sept. 1. The first squadron, originally planned to go on alert on that date, will not be ready until December of this year.

Item: One-third of America's land-based nuclear explosive capability—sitting on aging, Titan II missiles—has been earmarked for retirement beginning next year. That's four years ahead of the Carter administration schedule and well before 1986, when the first of their replacement missiles, the MX, are to be deployed.

Item: No significant acceleration is planned by the administration for the D5 Trident II missile, the next generation of submarine-launched missile, which looks now to be the weapon on which Weinberger is basing his future strategic program.

Item: This lack of acceleration on the D5 comes despite what is perhaps Reagan's largest arms reduction action: his decision to halve former President Carter's plan for 200 MX missiles to 100, and then to put just 40 in silos by 1988.

Item: The only new weapon in the Reagan plan, the B1 bomber, will now arrive in 1987, but it will make no significant difference even then in the basic U.S.-Soviet strategic balance of nuclear forces. The still undefined increase in Cruise missiles, to be put on bombers and aboard ships, also will have little effect on the basic nuclear balance.

In short, if a Democrat were in the White House today, conservative Republicans almost certainly would be accusing him of unilateral disarmament.

Much of the Reagan defense program, of course, is being driven by budget dilemmas. Despite big increases in Pentagon spending levels, the added dollars are unable to keep pace with more rapidly escalating costs.

The situation wasn't helped, moreover, by the Carter administration's underestimates of bills for major defense programs like the

MX. Carter projected costs of $35 billion for 200 missiles and 4,600 shelters, a figure the General Accounting Office termed far too optimistic. The reduced Reagan plan will cost $19.4 billion to buy 100 missiles and base only the 40.

The cut in American ballistic submarines results from a program initiated by the Navy under the Carter administration to retire the first 10 Polaris nuclear submarines. Two, whose nuclear reactors had run down, were withdrawn from the force more than a year ago and cut in half, to meet SALT I requirements. But the remaining eight were still operational. Nonetheless, the Reagan Pentagon team permitted them to be retired as ballistic missile subs Sept. 30, citing their high cost of operations and limited range, 1,500 miles, of their missiles. Ironically, sub-launched ship-launched cruise missiles, to which the Pentagon is now turning, travel a much shorter distance.

Is money driving Weinberger to these decisions, or is something more involved?

Some defense experts inside and outside the administration believe Secretary Weinberger is undertaking a surprising gamble for now, leaving himself the option of changing course next year. He appears to be hoping, they calculate, that at least the Soviets will overlook Washington's words and concentrate instead on what he is doing—or, more to the point, not doing. Then, these officials suggest, the hope is that the Soviets, too, will cut back on their expensive and threatening land-based missile program.

One administration official, for example, noted that the Soviets for more than a year have had at least one large, silo-based ICBM and another new, solid-fuel mobile ICBM ready for testing. Yet, to date, neither missile has been test fired.

Instead, for the past several months, this source said, the Soviets have been concentrating their tests on a large new missile for the Typhoon submarine, which is much like our Trident. Sub-launched missiles, this source emphasized, are unlikely to be first-strike weapons.

Another top Pentagon official remarked recently in private that he hoped when the Russians do test a new land-based ICBM, it will be the mobile one, which he said would also be less threatening to the United States.

Beneath their concerns is the fact that the Reagan cutback in the MX program did more than reduce the number of missiles planned for deployment. It undermined the strategy put forward to justify the new ICBMs in the first place.

Carter's 200 MXs, each with 10 warheads, were to be the basis for a new nuclear doctrine—the so-called PD-59 announced in August 1980. The missiles were to provide a force which not only could survive a Soviet first strike—because they were to be rotated among 4,600 shelters—but which also could retaliate in numbers capable of destroying the silo-based missiles the Russians had left.

This was all mystical to most people and nonsense to others, but to the true believers in nuclear strategy, PD-59 was a doctrine to be devoured and argued over endlessly.

But if Secretary Weinberger now puts only 40 MXs in silos, they will be just as vulnerable to a Soviet strike as the missiles we have today. And you can forget the talk about hardening the silos: It can't be done, and the administration may not even try.

Where does that leave PD-59 and all the other war-fighting strategies that the Reaganites have talked about for years?

"There has been considerable uncertainty about the substance of the Reagan administration's strategic policy," was the generous way that question was answered recently in an article by Donald M. Kerr, director of the Los Alamos National Laboratory, and Robert H. Kupperman, executive director of Georgetown University's Center for Strategic and International Studies.

These two authorities on nuclear strategy say that the presidential campaign and the Reagan transition gave the appearance that "a Reagan administration would react strongly, if not overreact, to the perceived Soviet threat and the so-called 'window of vulnerability.'" Instead, they write, the president's programs to date "have gratified neither hawk nor dove."

Unavoidably, this Reagan defense dichotomy has produced a similar mismatch between rhetoric and reality on the opposite side of the defense coin—arms control.

A basic criticism of the SALT II arms limitation treaty, voiced by candidate Reagan and many of those now high in his administration, was that the Carter treaty left the Soviets with a major advantage in the amount of nuclear power—"megatonnage" in defense parlance—they could deliver on the United States. Because the Soviets had bigger missiles with bigger and thus more powerful warheads, this argument went, the United States under SALT II would remain at a permanent disadvantage. The treaty, after all, limited the number of launchers and warheads each side could have without also limiting their size.

To correct this, Reagan often said during his campaign that he would negotiate with the Soviets next time only from a position of strength—meaning adding megatonnage to U.S. nuclear forces before new talks began. But his unilateral decision to halve the number of MX missiles he plans to build has instead cut the originally anticipated increase in U.S. megatonnage. At the same time, moreover, Reagan's decision to retire the Titan II missiles, which carry this country's biggest warheads, will sharply reduce existing U.S. megatonnage.

How can Reagan conceivably negotiate then from a position of strength? How can his negotiators reach some acceptable agreement with the Soviets on megatonnage if the president's actions will increase Moscow's lead in this area of land-based ICBMs to nearly five times that of the United States?

The answer seems to be that the administration will come up with a radical new form of measuring comparative nuclear strength, that it will not use the single standard which it termed the most important yardstick just a year ago. Surprising as it may seem, two conservative Reagan officials in the defense field within the last month have said privately that such notions—again altering rhetoric rather than reality—are currently being discussed.

One approach, sources said, is to use the concept of "survivable megatonnage," an idea built on calculations put together during the SALT II debate by Paul Nitze, who is now Reagan's negotiator with the Soviets on intermediate-range missiles. This concept measures the megatonnage on each side that could survive a first strike.

The United States does better using this approach, because so many more of our warheads are on survivable submarine missiles, while three-quarters of Soviet warheads are on land-based missiles that would be vulnerable to an American attack. But how this could be translated to an arms control approach remains to be seen.

What is clear is that all of this is frustrating to former Carter defense officials who were ruthlessly attacked as being weak and whose SALT II treaty was unable to pass the Senate. Former Defense Secretary Harold Brown has bitterly criticized the Reagan defense cutbacks, but his criticisms have had none of the impact that Reagan attacks on Carter policies generated just over a year ago.

The plain fact is that conservative Republicans have much greater leeway for action—or inaction—in the nuclear weapons field than do Democrats.

Remember that it was Henry Kissinger and Richard Nixon who in 1972 traded away a U.S. numerical advantage in sub-launched ballistic missiles to get a SALT I agreement. It was also Kissinger and Nixon, in the same treaty, who accepted a definition for a new Soviet ICBM that was broad enough to permit Moscow to almost double the size of its new weapon and thereby move far ahead of the United States.

Back then, the Nixon administration had few defense critics on their right, and the Democrats were fully ready to support whatever arms control agreement they could get. The same situation exists today for Reagan and Weinberger.

What is different today, however, is the verbal gap that the president and defense secretary have created. They are doing one thing, cutting strategic nuclear forces, and saying the opposite. Are they fooling themselves? Or is this a sophisticated plan, based on the hope that the Russians will cut back also?

Secretary Weinberger has positioned himself so that he can still change gear in July 1983, when he is to decide what to do with the 60 additional MX missiles scheduled to be built. By then, he will have had a look at the new Soviet missile tests and, hopefully, we will have had two years of new strategic arms reduction talks in Geneva.

If the Russians are tough on arms control and have tested a big new missile, the defense secretary could push the U.S. program into high gear, perhaps even reviving the mobile-based MX of Carter and throwing in an antiballistic missile system.

But if the Soviets remain restrained in their arms building and flexible on arms control, who knows what could happen under an administration that has pledged to be tough and acted in the opposite manner?

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 17, 1982]

NO, WE'RE NOT DISARMING

(By Caspar W. Weinberger)

Washington Post staff writer Walter Pincus argues in Outlook (Jan. 10), that the administration in the past year "actually presided over a significant reduction in strategic nuclear weapons on alert as well as the development of new weapons for the future." To phrase it in the most charitable way possible, it is extremely difficult to conceive how Pincus or anyone could consider that the president's $180 billion strategic modernization program amounts to "unilateral disarmament."

The "significant reduction" to which he refers is the administration's plan to retire Titan missiles first deployed some 20 years ago and to continue the planned phase-out of the Polaris missiles now approaching the end of their useful life. Neither of these obsolete systems contributes enough to the security of our strategic deterrent to justify the increasing cost of maintaining them. And unlike the Carter administration, we do not feel bound to retain in the inventory weapons that are militarily ineffective and costly to maintain merely to convey the hollow appearance of a strategic force more formidable than we actually possess.

Pincus attributes to unidentified "defense experts" the novel theory that the president's MX program, which entails an interim silo deployment coupled with a vigorous search for a new, permanent and effective basing mode, is really a guileful temporizing aimed at eliciting from the Soviets a voluntary cutback in their ICBM program. To make this fantasy appear plausible, he cites an unidentified "administration official" who has interpreted a nonexistent "delay" in the Soviet ICBM test program, and alleged evidence of their tests of submarine-launched ballistic missiles, as an indication that the Soviets are exercising restraint in testing threatening ICBMs while going forward with SLBMs that are "unlikely to be first-strike weapons."

This is sheer nonsense. For one thing, the current Soviet ICBM force is, unhappily, more than adequate for a too-effective first strike against our Minuteman missiles. For another, we see no reason to believe that, even if there were delays in the Soviet ICBM test program, that would imply any slowing of the relentless Soviet strategic buildup, a buildup that has already reached dangerous proportions and shows no signs of diminishing. And finally, no one who has listened to the president or understood his determination to redress the strategic balance could interpret the administration's MX program as a gesture of unilateral restraint. It was the last administration that learned to its regret that unilateral restraint will not be reciprocated by the Soviets. The Reagan administration has never for a moment entertained this dangerous illusion.

The administration has embarked on a comprehensive program aimed at reversing the strategic decline of the last decade. It entails the modernization of all elements of our strategic triad: the deployment of the MX ICBM; the decision to proceed with the B1 bomber now and accelerated research and development on an advanced technology bomber for deployment later; the decision to develop a greatly improved Trident II missile; the new deployment of sea-launched and further deployment of air-launched cruise missiles; and the significant improvement in our systems of command, control and communications. No one of these programs will solve all the problems we face. Taken together, this multiplicity of partial solutions will give us the capability we need to respond adequately to the sustained growth of Soviet strategic forces. It is significant that, in his apparent desire to show that we are not adding to our strength, he fails even to mention the vast command and control investments and improvements we are making. Without those, even the inadequate Carter program could not be operated effectively.

Pincus is right in saying that the Reagan administration has been critical of the SALT II treaty that the Senate refused to ratify. But he is wrong in his characterization of our criticism. We share the view of the Senate Committee on Armed Services that the treaty failed to limit the threat to the security of our strategic deterrent. By permitting the continued growth of Soviet strategic forces, SALT II gave only the appearance, but not the reality, of moderation and restraint. The SALT II "limits," like the SALT I "limits" before them, failed to constrain the momentum of the Soviet strategic buildup. The forces permitted on the Soviet side were more than enough to leave our land-based missiles vulnerable to Soviet attack. The apparent constraint on their deployment of "new" missiles was little more than an elaborate loophole through which a new generation of Soviet missiles then under development could easily pass. That is what was wrong with the SALT II treaty—not, as Pincus suggests, the single fact that it left the Soviets with more megatonnage than the United States was permitted.

The president's program will enhance our ability to negotiate arms reduction proposals that are equitable, verifiable and—perhaps most important—that would really reduce arms and thereby reduce the threat to our security.

That is why the president's program is so vitally needed: it does add enormous strength both to our strategic forces and to our ability to secure, by negotiation, Soviet arms reductions.

CHILDREN OF WAR

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, among the most tragic victims of war's horrors are children.

National attention was focused recently on children as war victims in a lengthy, well-done feature article in the January 11, 1982 issue of Time magazine.

The article was based on the experiences and remembrances of children in Ireland, Lebanon, Cambodia, Vietnam, and Israel, their lives shattered by the loss of parents, siblings and friends to bullets and bayonets.

A tremendous price has been paid by these young victims: Psychological trauma. Emotional emptiness. And the gnawing loneliness that comes from the sudden loss of loved ones.

And yet, the article speaks of faith.

The faith that these young people have in their fellow man—and in God—endures despite the pain and hurt of their daily lives.

For example, there is Paul Rowe, a 13-year-old in Belfast, Ireland, whose father was killed during the "Troubles" as natives call the unending battle between Protestants and Catholics in that strife-torn city.

As a result of that killing, Paul must come to grips with his faith in his fellow man. His friend Joseph has one word of advice: revenge.

Revenge. That's what you want. Isn't it Paul? Paul says nothing. "I'd want revenge," says Joseph, looking again to Paul. Paul eventually nods; then says faintly: "Aye. Revenge."

But the article continues:

Alone, away from Joseph, Paul is more himself. "That business about revenge. Is that really what you want?" The boy looks helpless. "No. It doesn't matter who done it. Nothin's worth killing someone."

Most Belfast children are like Paul. They have not all suffered so directly from the Troubles, but their response to the Troubles is similar. They carry no hatred in their hearts, they show a will to survive, and they are exceptionally gentle with grownups and with one another.

Yet, in spite of such gentleness, the children in the article sometimes displayed an unparalleled viciousness toward each other—usually after such inhuman acts were encouraged by adults. It is manipulation of the human spirit of the worst sort.

For example, listen to 11-year-old Sokhar, a Cambodian child, as she explains a picture to a reporter:

She takes it in her hands and studies what she drew: three children gathering rice in a field. A Khmer Rouge soldier has a rifle trained on them, "to keep them working." Off to the left of the picture is the device. It looks like a wheel with a hollow hub and spokes leading out to the rim. . . .

"What is happening here, Sokhar?"

"This is a picture of the Pol Pot time." She hopes to change the subject.

"Who are these people?"

"They harvest the rice."

"And what is this (the circular device)?"

"This is something you put on the head."

"Who puts it on your head?"

"The Pol Pot soldiers."

"What is its purpose?"

"To kill."

"Do soldiers do the killing?"

No answer.

But eventually it is learned how the device was used:

The children harvesting rice include Sokhar; she is the largest of the three. Whenever a child refused to work, he was punished with the circular device. The soldiers would place it over the child's head. Three people would hold it steady by means of ropes (the three lines at the bottom). A fourth would grab hold of the ring at the end of the other rope (the line at the top). The device worked like a camera lens, the areas between the lines in the drawing being metal blades. When the rope with the ring was pulled, the lens would close, and the child would be decapitated. A portable guillotine. But it wasn't the soldiers who worked the device. It was the children.

Manipulation of these young people took still other forms in these nations—even to the point of perverting their tragic personal loss for political gain:

What the terrorists do to keep the children in line is to use them in their battles, and the children recognize this. Here as in Lebanon and elsewhere, children are often deliberately placed at the head of demonstrations, marches and funeral processions. Their mere presence gives moral authority to the cause.

A booklet under the prosaic title "Rubber & Plastic Bullets Kill & Maim" contains the pictures and stories of child victims; the more brutal, the better. Such devices work especially well in Belfast, where everyone gives the impression of knowing everyone else, where people like Paul and Bernadette achieve a dubious celebrity for having their lives shot out from under them.

Mr. President, this is a cruel irony: the very people for whom the war is often fought are the pawns used and abused in winning the battle.

But even in the using, new levels of horror are sometimes reached: Witness the story of Pham, a Vietnamese youth who survives a harrowing experience at sea:

"Why were you hit on the head?"

"The boatmaster wanted to eat me."

"How do you know this?"

"The boatmaster told a boy who was a neighbor of mine to take a hammer and hit me on the head, so that they might eat my flesh. The boy told me."

"Why did you believe him? Did you ever see such a thing before?"

"No. But earlier in the voyage the boatmaster wanted to kill someone else for the same purpose. The man was so scared he committed suicide; he struck the boatmaster on the head with a wooden bar and then leaped overboard."

"And how did they try to kill you?"

"They put a shirt over my head, and they hit me with something hard. I felt the men coming over to lift off the shirt. But I was still conscious. I heard the boatmaster order another man to cut my throat."

"At the moment they took the shirt off my head, they saw I was still conscious, and that tears were on my face. I did not know what they were thinking. Then someone said: 'Pham, do you want to live?' And I said: 'Yes, of course I want to live.' So they untied me and took me into the cabin."

Even if these young people survive the tortures, the abuse, and the personal loss, they suffer a more unseen tragedy: a loss of innocence, a sense of wonder that accompanies the tender years.

Joy, the natural birthright of every child, must then be learned. Listen to Mrs. Sameeha Khalil who runs a school, training center and haven for Palestinian children, as she listens to young people discuss the war-like atmosphere in which they live:

Made edgy by the conversation, Mrs. Khalil emphasizes that the aim of her society is to teach the children to love the beautiful things in the old country, and not to frighten them. "You don't want to start striking out right and left." She waves right and left with her arms; her English rolls in a heavy swell. "You want to make distinctions. A good Jew from a bad Jew. A good Arab from a bad. Also you want to show that life is not all hardship. There is joy here too."

Perhaps the ultimate victim in all this is civilized society itself. We suffer. We are the ones who must heal the psychological and emotional hurts that these young ones have experienced. And we are the ones who must become the next victims when the scarred children become embittered adults:

Alexander Lyons, a Belfast psychiatrist, points out that in a chaotic world, antisocial behavior is acceptable. That is why he finds so little of what might be termed "emotional disturbance," in the clinical sense, among the Belfast children, since, in a way, the whole place is emotionally disturbed. The kids play war games, but there is nothing unique in that. Indeed, their war games are made more normal by the fact that the grownups play them, too.

. . . Lyons is far more impressed by the resilience of the children than by their fears or rampages. A girl who had three limbs blown off by a bomb managed to hold on to her mind and eventually marry. But Lyons stresses that resilience is a short-term effect. "In the long run (his voice is calm and certain) we are raising a generation of bigots."

Mr. President, we have to ask ourselves one question after reading this chilling article: Why?

For the moment, these children are in the hands of others. They are the moved from place to place, the led and hidden, the dragged along and swung into the sky, the hugged, the tickled, the slapped, the taught, the scolded, teased, praised—and sometimes the shot at, and sometimes the decapitated and the killed for food. All that can be done to them is done, and they do what they are told. But not forever. One morning, the streets through which they skitter now will be theirs to command. They will not think what to do; they will already know. Whatever becomes of them and of their countries will have been decided in some absolutely innocuous moment during these innocuous years, a moment they will not be able to trace. Their thinking done, they will rule largely by reflex, just as their parents did before them.

Let us not fight wars for the sake of future generations. Let us stop wars—for the future generations' sake.

PREMIERE OF THE FILM "GENOCIDE"

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, on Sunday, January 17 of this year the film "Genocide" premiered at the Kennedy Center before an audience consisting of Members of Congress, diplomats, entertainers, prominent members of the Jewish community and concentration camp survivors. The movie left the spectators speechless. It certainly accomplished its goal.

"Genocide" was produced by the Simon Wiesenthal Foundation as a teaching aid, primarily for high schools and universities. The movie portrays the plight of European Jews and other subcultures who were victims of Nazi persecution. It makes use of memoirs, photographs, and newsreels from archives.

However, this is by no means the first attempt to produce an instructive film on the Holocaust. What makes "Genocide" different is that it is narrated by famous celebrities—Elizabeth Taylor, Orsen Welles, and Frank Sinatra. With this drawing card students are more likely to take a serious look at the subject.

I have been speaking on this subject for many years. I have given more than 2,500 speeches pleading with my colleagues to ratify the Genocide Convention. I am delighted that this film was presented here in Washington. I regret that Members of Congress were in recess at the time. But I am very hopeful that my colleagues will have an opportunity to see it and to recognize the justice in finally ratifying this convention.

The need for education on the Holocaust cannot be overestimated. I agree wholeheartedly with Representative PATRICIA SCHROEDER'S comment made at the film's opening—

I don't think there's enough that can be done to remember these people. We are not a nation of historical roots and [therefore] tend to forget what has just happened.

Nonetheless, education is only one measure that must be taken to safeguard against other commissions of genocide. The Senate must put the United States on record as pronouncing genocide an international crime, as well. The way to accomplish this task is to ratify the Genocide Convention.

The Genocide Convention was drafted under the auspices of the United Nations in 1948. Since that time more than 80 nations have become parties to it. More than half of the countries in the world have officially outlawed genocide, but the United States, I am disappointed to admit, has not taken such action.

The campaign to forever end the threat of genocide continues, and I applaud the efforts of the Weisenthal Center for its contribution. Teaching tools, though, comprise only part of the drive. They can protect racial, ethnic, religious, and national groups only in a limited and tenuous way. Ratification of this treaty would clearly label genocide to be the act that it truly is—one of the most abhorrent crimes known to man.

As we begin the second session of the 97th Congress, it is essential that we make a commitment to act, affirmatively and decisively, to let the world know that the United States opposes genocide whenever and wherever it may occur.

The lessons of history require no less.

Mr. President, I yield the floor and yield back the time.

Mr. PELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island.

THE URGENT NEED TO RESUME STRATEGIC ARMS NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, tomorrow, Secretary Haig will meet in Geneva, Switzerland with Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko. The expectation has been that the main topic of that meeting would be the setting of a time and place for the resumption of strategic arms negotiations in accordance with the "Program for Peace" outlined by President Reagan on November 18.

According to press accounts, however, the administration has decided, because of events in Poland, not to agree to any date for resuming the negotiations which this administration has retitled as START, for strategic arms reduction talks. In this morning's press, an administration source was reported to have stated that there will be no agreement to begin START negotiations because President Reagan wants the Soviets to know that "we're not doing business as usual as long as repression is underway in Poland."

I fully share the administration's concern and outrage over the tragic repression that is taking place in Poland. I disagree, however, that discussing a time and place for resuming START negotiations should be considered as an element of "business as usual." Reducing nuclear arms as part of a strategy to lessen the danger of a nuclear holocaust is highly unusual business that must go forward as a top priority item on our country's foreign policy agenda.

It is the height of folly for the administration to link the START negotiations to Soviet misbehavior, whether in Poland or anywhere else. It is as if the administration believes we are conferring a great favor on the Soviet Union by sitting down with them to seek some means of starting to get the nuclear genie back in the bottle. This is an objective that is not just important to the United States or to the Soviet Union but is of vital importance to mankind. All of us passengers on Planet Earth have an equal interest in seeking to prevent a nuclear exchange.

That is why I believe that both START and the negotiations already underway to eliminate intermediate nuclear weapons in Europe should be kept on a separate track above and beyond every other diplomatic activity on which we are embarked. It is irresponsible leadership that does anything to delay or put off course these talks, thus putting mankind at greater risk than it already is, just to demonstrate disapproval of Soviet actions in Poland.

There are plenty of other ways that we can—and have—and should use to stress our disapproval of Soviet repression of the freedom-parched peoples of Eastern Europe and, particularly, Poland. But for the sake of all of us, and our children and our children's children, I strongly urge President Reagan and Secretary Haig not to delay any further the vital negotiations whose objective is to decrease the possibility of nuclear war. It is time to start START.

APPOINTMENT BY THE VICE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, on behalf of the Vice President, pursuant to Senate Resolution 381 of the 96th Congress, appoints the following persons to the Study Group on the Commemoration of the U.S. Senate Bicentenary: The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. FORD), the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL), and the former Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Anderson.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONGRESS AND THE "GENERAL WELFARE"

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, in the October 1981 edition of the American Bar Association Journal, there appeared an article by a distinguished member of the Seattle bar, Alfred J. Schweppe, who is also a former dean of the Law School of the University of Washington. It is entitled, "Congress and the 'General Welfare.' "

It is an examination of the operations of the Congress pursuant to the general welfare clause of the Constitution of the United States.

For the edification of the Members of this body, and because of the importance of the article, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS AND THE "GENERAL WELFARE"

(By Alfred J. Schweppe)

With all of the clamor and distress of the states and cities because of the reduction or cessation of federal grants and subsidies of one kind or another (for local sewers and streets and local budgets, for example), a recurrence to first principles is both necessary and timely. The blunt fact is that states and cities are not entitled to any monies from the federal government. The Founding Fathers in 1787 never so contemplated. Indeed, they would have been horrified at the very suggestion.

And so it was for a century and a half. But in 1935 the Supreme Court opened the floodgates. In Helvering v. Davis, 301 U.S. 619, upholding the Social Security Act six votes to two (Cardozo writing), the court rejected the views of Madison and Jefferson and adopted those of Hamilton, holding that Congress could tax and spend "for the general welfare," with Congress being the judge of the general welfare.

Madison and Jefferson entertained the view, one consistent with the concept of limited government, that the power of Congress to tax under Article 1, Section 8, was limited to promoting the general welfare under the powers specifically granted under the other clauses of the Constitution, but not to tax and spend for the "general welfare" itself. That section reads in part that Congress shall have power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

Madison, one of the most active members of the Constitutional Convention, whose proceedings he recorded in his invaluable Notes, explained that clause in the Federalist No. 41, which Chief Justice Marshall described "as of great authority." Madison denied that the clause "amounts to an unlimited commission to exercise every power which may be alleged to be necessary for the common defense or general welfare."

Jefferson, who was not at the Constitutional Convention because of his diplomatic duties in Paris but who followed the proceedings closely and took an active hand in the ratification, stated his view in a letter to Albert Gallatin that Congress had been given "not unlimited powers to provide for the general welfare, but were restrained to those specifically enumerated; and that, as it was never meant they should provide for that welfare but by the exercise of the enumerated powers." Indeed, in 1825 in the Virginia Protest, he reiterated: "This assembly does further disavow and declare to be most false and unfounded, the doctrine that the compact, in authorizing its federal branch to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises to pay the debts and provide for the commond defense and general welfare of the United States, have given them thereby a power to do whatever they may think, or pretend, would promote the general welfare, which construction would make that, of itself, a complete government, without limitation of powers; . . ." (Italics Jefferson's.)

But says the Supreme Court in Helvering v. Davis: "Congress may spend money in aid of the 'general welfare.' Constitution, Article 1, Section 8; United States v. Butler, 297 U.S. 1, 65; Steward Machine Company v. Davis, supra. There have been great statesmen in our history who have stood for other views. We will not resurrect the contest. It is now settled by decision. United States v. Butler, supra. The conception of the spending power advocated by Hamilton and strongly reinforced by Story has prevailed over that of Madison, which has not been lacking in adherents."

And in United States v. Gerlach Live Stock Company, 339 U.S. 725, 738 (1950), validating a federal reclamation project in California, the court said: "[I]n conferring power upon Congress to tax 'to pay the Debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States,' the Constitution delegates a power separate and distinct from those later enumerated, and one not restricted by them, and that Congress has a substantive power to tax and appropriate for the general welfare, limited only by the requirement that it shall be exercised for the common benefit as distinguished from some mere local purpose. If any doubt of this power remained, it was laid to rest the following year in Helvering v. Davis. . . . Thus the power of Congress to promote the general welfare through large-scale projects for reclamation, irrigation, or other internal improvements, is now as clear and simple as its power to accomplish the same results indirectly through resort to strained interpretation of the power over navigation."

While the Court in Gerlach said that the taxing power must be exercised for the common benefit, as distinguished from some mere local purpose, the federal reclamation project directly benefited California and only in a remote sense the nation. Indeed, it possibly hurt the nation as a whole by making more agricultural lands available to California in a time of national surplus of those lands and consequent depressed farm prices.

So today we have a federal government with not only unlimited taxing power under the income tax amendment but also with unlimited spending power for the general welfare, with Congress the judge of the general welfare. And while one might have supposed logically that Congress could tax and spend but not regulate under this concept of welfare spending, the court enlarged this power in Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111,

131 (1942), by holding that "it is hardly lack of due process for the Congress to regulate that which it subsidizes."

The political result is the spending of lavish sums by Congress for purposes that would have made the Founding Fathers scrap the Constitution could they have envisioned that perversion of their image of a limited federal government.

Many examples come to mind. What do you suppose the Founding Fathers would have thought of federal funds to build local sewer, water, or lighting systems, to build local schools, or to finance so-called urban renewal projects? This is now all part of the "general welfare" for which Congress spends money, which it does in a big way. These are all projects representing strictly a local responsibility, which, if they are to be had, should be financed solely by local taxation. But now all the cities and states run to Washington for money to pay for all or much of these local projects, and they have been getting billions in so-called federal grants-in-aid that until a few years ago were unconstitutional. A large part of our perennially unbalanced federal budget goes for these local projects.

Unless held invalid by the Supreme Court at some future date, this pattern of grants-in-aid for local projects will not change much, because the politicians at all levels like it. First, it relieves the local politicians of their duty to require the projects, many of them unneeded or premature, to be financed by local taxation, which is always unpopular and greatly to be feared by them. But these monies are collected by the remote tax collector—the federal government—and the local politician comes off scot-free.

Second, the federal politicians like it because it enables them to announce periodically to their constituents the grant of federal monies for pet local projects that the people are unwilling or reluctant to pay for themselves. This is accompanied by the innuendo that the community is getting something for nothing through these valiant political efforts, whereas in fact it amounts to nothing more in most cases than a return of local community dollars, less the federal charge for collecting and returning them.

The Court in Helvering v. Davis suggested that there may be some limit on the discretion of Congress to spend for the general welfare, such as a mere local purpose: "The line must still be drawn between one welfare and another, between particular and general. . . . The discretion belongs to Congress, unless the choice is clearly wrong, a display of arbitrary power, not an exercise of judgment. This is now familiar law.

". . . When such a contention comes here, we naturally require a showing that by no reasonably possibility can the challenged legislation fall within the wide range of discretion permitted to Congress. . . . Nor is the concept of the general welfare static. Needs that were narrow and parochial a century ago may be interwoven in our day with the well being of the nation. What is critical and urgent changes with the times."

Recently in Mathews v. DeCastro, 421 U.S. 181 (1976), the Court said:

"The basic principle that must govern an assessment of any constitutional challenge to a law providing for governmental payments is well established. Governmental decision to spend money for the general public welfare in one way or another are not confided to the courts. The discretion belongs to Congress, unless the choice is clearly wrong, a display of arbitrary power, not an exercise of judgment."

There was clearly an aberration in the court's use of the taxing clause in Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1, 90-91 (1976), a per curiam decision. That case involved limits on private contributions to political campaigns, not the expenditure of federal tax monies for the general welfare. But the court, after inappropriately citing Helvering v. Davis, said:

"In this case Congress was legislating for the 'general welfare'—to reduce the deleterious influence of large contributions on our political process, to facilitate communication by candidates with the electorate, and to free candidates from the rigors of fund raising. . . . Whether the chosen means appear bad, unwise, or unworkable to us is irrelevant; Congress has concluded that the means are 'necessary and proper' to promote the general welfare, and we thus decline to find this legislation without the grant of power in Article 1, Section 8."

This was clearly an aberration since no federal tax for the general welfare was involved. But the result can probably be sustained under the power of Congress to regulate presidential elections and primaries.

Candidates, among others, for legitimate retrenchment in federal welfare expenditures are agriculture and education.

In The Federalist No. 17 Hamilton, the advocate of using the taxing power for the general welfare, nevertheless wrote that "the supervision of agriculture and all other concerns of a similar nature, all those things, in short, which are proper to be provided for by local legislation, can never be desirable cares of the general jurisdiction."

Franklin D. Roosevelt, a lawyer, in his powerful "states rights" speech of March 2, 1930, with his eye on the presidency he won in 1932, stated that, among other things, power over agriculture, education, and social welfare had not been delegated to the federal government in the Constitution but reserved exclusively to the states. How unreal and antiquated those views sound today, 50 years later, but the fact is that F.D.R. destroyed the concept that he so clearly advocated in 1930.

Working with an obedient—one could almost say subservient—Congress, he proposed and caused to be enacted many national measures that exceeded the bounds of the Constitution as then understood. He asked the Congress to suppress any doubts as to constitutionality and described them as "new instruments of public power" that "in other hands would provide shackles for the liberties of the people."

Just as Hamilton had said that the purpose must be "general and not local," so the Court in United States v. Butler, 297 U.S. 1 (1936), said that "the power of taxation and appropriation extend only to matters of national as distinguished from local welfare." But the distinction has been ignored by Congress under the vast leeway allowed by the Court. Revenue sharing, the granting of money to local governments for local purposes, falls within the prohibition.

Pinpointing local education, we find that in Lau v. United States, 414 U.S. 453 (1973), the Court held that teaching English to Chinese pupils was required by the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which forbids discrimination in "any program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance." The San Francisco school district involved received "large amounts of federal assistance."

Fullilove v. Klutznik, 448 U.S. 448 (1980), involved the Public Works Employment Act of 1977, which provides: "No grant shall be made under this act for any local public works project unless the applicants gives satisfactory assurance to the Secretary that at least 10% of the amount of such grant shall be expended for minority enterprises."

With Chief Justice Burger writing the six-to-three decision (Justices Steward, Rehnquist, and Stevens dissenting), the Court held that the grant of federal monies "for any local public works project" in those circumstances was constitutional, declaring "great deference" to Congress. It almost seems that in designating federal funds "for any local public works project," Congress dared the Court to invoke its oft repeated, but never applied, judicial distinction. But it seems that the point was not made. Even the dissenters did not object on the ground that the welfare was "local" rather than "general." They disagreed only on the ground of unconstitutional discrimination.

That, for now, is the last word on the subject of federal grants for local public works. If the Court in the future on a direct challenge to federal grants for any local purpose adheres to its implicit Fullilove position, we would then have what Jefferson so vehemently decried: "a complete government, without limitation of powers."

The bald fact stands out that no case to date has either the Supreme Court or any lower court held any federal grant unconstitutional as being for local rather than for general welfare, doubtless because no one has had an interest in financing a challenge to a grant. Even though the prohibition of taxpayer suits in Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447 (1923), has been removed by Flast v. Cohen, 392 U.S. 83 (1969), no taxpayer has raised a hand. But the rules that the Supreme Court has laid down and the distinction it has made clearly show that Congress has no duty to make any grants for the general welfare. It surely can desist, with presidential prodding, from grants for what in many cases would be grants for local welfare.

Better that Congress should cease all grants and revenue sharing, including local public works projects, and instead cut federal taxes. All other tax-cutting considerations aside, the reduction at least should equal the amounts now making up federal grants to local governments and the cost of collecting and distributing the grant money. To that extent, state power to tax for local needs would be enhanced. Congress should confine its taxing and spending strictly to federal purposes within the Constitution. Even with the judicial "general welfare" enlargement beyond the interpretations of Madison and Jefferson, that would give us at least a return in part to the federalism contemplated by the founders.

The taxing power ("the power to destroy," as Marshall said) is an ominous one, to be wisely exercised. Any retrenchment in federal taxation and federal grants merely fixes the basic responsibility for local welfare in states where, as Hamilton said, it has belonged since 1787. Indeed, designing local budgets for local programs in reliance on federal grants, in whole or in part, may be approaching the end. So be it.

Mr. GORTON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DR. JOHN BRADEMAS—A CHAMPION OF INTERNATIONAL EDUCATION

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I should like to draw the attention of the Senate to the words of Dr. John Brademas, the truly distinguished former Member of Congress, now President of New York University, who recently delivered an address in Jersualem at a convocation celebrating the 25th anniversary of the Fulbright scholars program in Israel.

During his 22 years as a Representative from Indiana, there was no more eloquent or effective champion of international education programs than John Brademas. Happily, his speech of January 12 demonstrates that Dr. Brademas continues in his lifelong work for the successful development of international education. Indeed, he challenges us, all of us, in the Congress, at colleges and universities, in private enterprise, to sustain international education and exchange programs for they are essential to the "quest for a stable peace and a world of freedom and justice."

I am particularly pleased to note that on January 12, President Brademas announced that New York University will establish the Anwar El-Sadat Chair in Diplomacy, in fitting tribute to President Sadat and the quest for a durable peace to which he gave his life.

I ask unanimous consent that Dr. Brademas' address of January 12, 1982, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY DR. JOHN BRADEMAS

I am pleased and honored to speak at this festive convocation to celebrate 25 years of the Fulbright program in Israel.

First, I should like to thank Ambassador Samuel Lewis and Mr. Daniel Krauskopf for having invited me to be with you on this occasion. As Executive Secretary of the United States-Israel Educational Foundation, Mr. Krauskopf has done a splendid job in administering the Fulbright program in Israel for 23 of its 25 years, and the success of the program is a reflection of his dedicated service.

I have had the privilege of knowing Ambassador Lewis for a number of years, and I regard him as one of the ablest and most effective representatives of the United States in any country. Ambassador Lewis has eloquently and vigorously voiced the commitment of the American people to Israel and our determination to remain a steadfast friend and to play a constructive role in the search for peace in the Middle East, a peace that must be predicated on a strong and secure Israel.

I am also particularly pleased to have been introduced to you today by my friend Avraham Harmon, President of the Hebrew University.

A former Ambassador to the United States, he served his country with great distinction during his years in Washington and I speak from personal knowledge because those were years when I, too, was in that city.

Here in this audience today are distinguished statesmen, scholars and educators. As president of one of the largest universities in the United States, I share many concerns with those of you who, like President Harmon, lead the universities and other institutions of higher learning of Israel.

I also feel a special affinity for the many former Fulbright Fellows here this evening for I, too, was fortunate enough to have taken part in an international study program. From 1950 to 1953, I studied as a Rhodes Scholar at Oxford University, three of the happiest and most rewarding years of my life.

I have yet another connection to the Fulbright program: my younger brother, Jim, was a Fulbright teacher in Greece twenty-five years ago.

Let me say also how delighted I am to be back in Israel. I made my first visit to this remarkable country in 1970 when I led a delegation of members of the Committee on Education and Labor of the United States House of Representatives.

We came to see your moshavim, your kibbutzim, your day-care centers, your schools, your institutes and universities. What we observed here helped us greatly as we considered education legislation in the United States, and what we saw here, even on a brief trip, gave us some insight into the extraordinary energy and commitment of the people of Israel.

In 1979 I returned to Jerusalem to lecture at the Leonard Davis Institute of International Relations at the Hebrew University.

CONGRESSIONAL SUPPORT FOR ISRAEL

As a member of Congress for twenty-two years and as Majority Whip on the House for four, I did enjoy a unique opportunity to observe something of the significant relationship between Israel and the American Congress.

Let me say a few words about that relationship. For although President Truman played an historic role by recognizing the State of Israel at its creation, it was the strong support of Congress which gave flesh to that recognition.

Over the years, Congress, representing the will of the American people, demonstrated its commitment to Israel by voting economic and military support as well as by expressing America's moral support for the new democracy.

More recently, only moments after the signing of the Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty by Prime Minister Begin, President Sadat and President Carter on the White House lawn—an impressive ceremony I was privileged to have witnessed—President Carter invited several Congressional leaders into his office for a private meeting. There, our then President explained the Camp David Accord in detail and told us how he would need our support in order for the peace process to have a chance to succeed in the Middle East.

And, as you know, Congress responded enthusiastically with a major increase in aid for the two signatory nations.

So the relationship between the people of Israel and the Congress of the United States, representing in a direct sense, the American people, has always been special.

Indeed, my own initial political stirrings came as a schoolboy hearing on the radio the speeches of Adolf Hitler and reading reports of Nazi persecution of Jews. Nothing shook me more profoundly. And, therefore, like many other Christian Americans of my generation, I came to be a strong supporter of the creation of a homeland for the Jewish people in Israel. That support, for me and for most of my countrymen, has never wavered.

MEANING OF ISRAEL TO AMERICANS

Israel, after all, has a special meaning for Christians as well as Jews. No Christian can see this land, breathe this air, walk these streets and hills without experiencing the deepest emotional feelings.

When Christians worship on Sundays in my native state of Indiana, my new home in New York or anywhere throughout our country, we read from the Old Testament as well as from the New. We share the Judaic tradition. In fact, our country was established and nurtured in the Judaic-Christian tradition. Christians and Jews share certain conceptions of man's relationship to his world, his fellow human beings and his God.

Americans also feel particularly close to Israel because Israel is like America in so many ways. We are both vigorous democracies. We are accustomed to controversy. We share a deep commitment to individual freedom and popular self-government.

And both our countries have a distinctly international character. Both are nations of immigrants. Both have been havens for oppressed peoples.

IMPORTANCE OF INTERNATIONAL EDUCATION

As we mark the 25th anniversary of the Fulbright program in Israel, I should like to discuss with you this evening from the perspective of an American politican and educator what we may call "international education"—what such education is, why it matters and how we can strengthen it in our colleges and universities.

Let me add that this is no new interest of mine for twenty years ago, as a young Congressman and champion of President John F. Kennedy, a colleague and I visited South America to study the university system there.

Our visit persuaded me that the colleges and universities of that region were an indispensable key to the economic development and social reform needed for the nations of Latin America to create democratic societies and free political institutions that would endure. I also became convinced that it was imperative that North Americans learned more about our neighbors and provided them opportunities to learn about us.

Two decades later, I think it is all the more obvious that domestic and foreign concerns not only in the Western hemisphere but throughout the world, can no longer be separated.

In a time when information, trade and people move with unprecedented speed across national borders, we can all prosper—indeed, survive—only if we have a deeper and broader knowledge of the countries and cultures of this planet.

The globe on which we live is, in the universal scheme of things, small and interdependent. Martial law in Poland, a poor rice harvest in China, the invasion of Afghanistan, civil war in Central America—these are all events that reach far across national borders.

ARE AMERICANS PREPARED?

In such a world, how well are we preparing people—specifically, how well are we preparing Americans—to comprehend that world? To understand other nations, other cultures, other peoples?

In my view, we are not doing very well.

There is simply no question in my view that the people of the United States, in whose hands, for better or for worse, lies much of the responsibility for building a peaceful and stable world, must do a far better job than we have been doing of learning about the rest of it.

Only two years ago, let me observe, a 25-member commission on Foreign Language and International Studies, chaired by James Perkins, former President of Cornell University, reported to President Carter on what the Commission described as America's "scandalous incompetence" in foreign languages.

The Commission members declared themselves profoundly alarmed by the results of their inquiry. Here are just a few of their findings:

1. Over 40 percent of twelfth graders were unable to place Egypt correctly on a map while over 20 percent were equally ignorant about the location of France or China.

2. Only 15 percent of American high school students studied a foreign language, down from 24 percent in 1965; and the decline continues.

3. The agencies of our government responsible for foreign relations were deeply concerned that decreasing foreign language enrollments in our schools and colleges were lowering the quality of new recruits for their services and increasing the costs of providing necessary language training.

The hostage crisis in Iran provided a dramatic illustration of a failure to understand another country and its culture. An analysis published in The New York Times asserted that "many developments resulted from misconceptions. But the Examination also," said the Times, "shed light on more subtle but substantive issues, such as the fact that for ten of the hostages' fourteen months in captivity, the United States negotiated with the wrong leaders in Iran, the secular, titular leaders rather than the religious leaders who held the real power. . ."

How have such situations come about?

DANGEROUS U.S. IGNORANCE

There is no single explanation for our costly and dangerous ignorance.

Surely one reason can be found in America's geography and our long-standing tradition of assimilation. As a nation of immigrants, America was populated by people who fled from intolerable conditions in their native lands. They wanted to forget the past and to embrace the new American culture and language, and it did not seem necessary or desirable to hold on to a knowledge of the languages and traditions of the old country.

INTERNATIONAL EDUCATION ACT

For a time, it did seem as though we as a country were extending our commitment to international education. Sixteen years ago, Congress passed the International Education Act of 1966. This law, of which I was principal author, called for grants to colleges and universities in the United States to support study and research, both at the undergraduate and graduate levels, about foreign peoples and cultures and important issues in international affairs.

President Lyndon Johnson signed the International Education Act into law, but, I regret to tell you, Congress never voted one penny to turn our sound intentions into effective action. Yet I believe that had this commitment to international education we sought a decade and a half ago been carried through, we might have been far better prepared to deal with problems we have suffered in Iran, Vietnam, Central America and elsewhere.

But America's schools and colleges are themselves not without blame. A study by the American Council on Education, one of our country's leading voices for colleges and universities, reported that, at most, only 5 percent of the country's prospective teachers ever take any course relating to international affairs or foreign people and cultures as part of their professional preparation. In this case, what they don't know will hurt them—and their students as well.

In the 1960s, many colleges and universities responded to student demands for greater flexibility and "relevance" in their studies by eliminating foreign language requirements. Not suprisingly, many secondary schools followed suit.

Today, many schools, colleges and universities, concerned about balancing their budgets, often react by cutting back on courses about other cultures or other languages, which they see as merely "frills."

Most distressing of all is that the present Administration in Wahington has embarked on a course of slashing funds for our schools, colleges and universities and other institutions of education and culture—a course that gravely threatens the continued existence of programs of international exchange like the Fulbrights.

But I do not want to sound wholly alarmist or negative. I see some signs of hope.

In the past few months, for example, we successfully overcame a threat to decimate federally sponsored educational and cultural exchanges, including the Fulbright program.

ESTABLISHMENT OF FULBRIGHT PROGRAM

The government of the United States, as you know, made its first serious commitment to international exchange in 1946 with the Fulbright program.

Senator William Fulbright, its founder, proposed using the war debts of foreign countries to finance international exchanges so that people "might develop a capacity for empathy, a distaste for killing other men, and an inclination for peace."

Since its founding, the Fulbright program has enabled approximately 45,000 Americans to teach and study abroad, and 80,000 scholars from over 100 countries to do the same in the United States.

The program reached its peak in 1965 when its budget was $76 million with 9,000 scholars participating. Cutbacks since then have reduced these figures by about 40 percent. In 1981, the program was budgeted at $48.1 million with 5,500 participants—about 3,000 coming to the United States and 2,500 Americans going abroad. Exchanges were conducted with 120 countries.

FULBRIGHTS IN ISRAEL

One of those, of course, has been Israel. Since the beginning of the Fulbright program here, some 280 Americans have come to this remarkable land, and we, in turn, have welcomed 520 Israeli men and women to our shores.

Today, there are ten American Fulbright Fellows teaching and studying in Israel, and 24 Israeli Fellows in the United States.

These exchanges, as many of you know from your own experience, have provided significant benefits to the Fulbright Fellows as well as to both our countries.

For example, American Fulbright scholars have helped develop the curricula of colleges and universities in Israel in areas such as teaching English as a foreign language, science education, and American studies, including American history, literature and social work.

Israelis, in turn, have made distinct contributions to American life. An Israeli Fulbright scholar in the Washington, D.C. area, to cite only one example, is helping develop a model program for holocaust studies in the United States.

Although it is not possible to tell you all the accomplishments of Israeli Fulbright scholars over the years, I would have you consider for a moment the excellence of the men and women who comprise this select group. Today, among their ranks are a Supreme Court Justice, two undersecretaries in cabinet ministries, the Chairman of the Advisory Council of the Bank of Israel, and dozens of university deans and department heads.

SUCCESS OF FULBRIGHTS

Indeed, I believe that the Fulbright program in general has been a resounding success, certainly for the United States. A survey of over 3,000 former Fellows conducted in 1979 by the Fulbright Alumni Association and the President's Commission on Foreign Language and International Studies found that 72 percent have kept up contact with their Fulbright country and had subsequent professional contact with other foreign countries; 76 percent have used materials from their time abroad in teaching; and 72 percent have changed their view of the world as a result of their Fulbright experience.

In addition, a study of American teachers who have benefited from Fulbright and other exchanges showed that the overwhelming majority subsequently became more concerned with global issues; 77 percent were devoting more teaching time to international affairs and 83 percent felt that they had improved their students' attitudes toward other countries.

As Donald Stokes, Dean of the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Studies at Princeton University, has said, "These programs have brought this country more influence and goodwill in the world than any comparable outlay in taxpayer dollars since World War II."

Certainly the Soviet Union considers international educational exchanges to be of great value. In recent years, the Soviets have substantially increased both admission of foreign students to their universities and their exchange programs. Currently, the Soviet Union spends about $3 billion a year for such purposes. I might point out that the Soviets annually provide 24,000 fellowships to Africans, 12 times the American total. And the Soviets offer Latin Americans nearly 5,000 fellowships, 10 times the number the United States makes available to Latin Americans.

THREATS TO FULBRIGHT PROGRAM

Despite these extraordinary comparisons, last fall the Fulbright program and several companion programs faced virtual extinction. The United States International Communications Agency, which administers these programs, was told to reduce its spending by 12 percent. The Agency in its wisdom decided that the bulk of these cuts should be absorbed by the exchange programs and proposed cutting the Fulbright program in half, slashing funds from $48.1 million to $22.5 million and reducing the number of participating countries from 120 to 59.

Similarly, the ICA moved to cut by 50 percent the International Visitor Program, which currently brings 1,500 people to the United States, many of them potential leaders of their countries. The ICA decided to eliminate the Hubert H. Humphrey Fellowships, which provide advanced training in the United States for mid-career professionals from Third World countries.

I am delighted to be able to report to you that Congress last month voted to reject these disastrous cuts. Moreover, legislation approved by Congress earmarked $100 million of the ICA budget for international exchange programs, an increase of $11 million over the amount these programs received last year.

In one sense this crisis has been reassuring. For it proved conclusively that there is a strong and vocal constituency in America in support of international education and exchange. Educators, foreign affairs specialists, former exchange scholars, and members of Congress of both parties joined forces in a vigorous and successful effort to fend off the proposed cutbacks.

I would like to salute, in particular, the efforts of Senator Claiborne Pell, Democrat of Rhode Island; Senator Lowell Weicker, Jr., Republican of Connecticut; and Representative Dante Fascell, Democrat of Florida.

There is, of course, no way to predict future funding levels for these programs. But as Wallace Edgerton, president of the Institute of International Education, which helps administer the Fulbrights in the United States, has said, "For the present, all those concerned about public diplomacy have scored a signal victory."

RETURN TO EDUCATIONAL RIGOR

Beyond this recent victory, I have been heartened by several other developments. I read recently that Latin, a so-called "dead language", is making a comeback in the United States, not only in colleges, where it is still pursued by a "courageous minority", but at every level of schooling.

There has, in fact, been a general reaction to the relaxation of academic standards that took place in the '60s and early '70s. Many universities, including my own alma mater, Harvard, the University of Pennsylvania, Emory College, Middlebury College, and the University Massachusetts, have abandoned the cafeteria-style principle of unlimited free electives and have begun, once again, to insist that students have such basics as mathematics and at least one foreign language as part of their education.

I am pleased to be able to say that New York University is in the vanguard of this return to rigor. Not only are all New York University undergraduate arts and science students required to achieve competency in a foreign language, but for the first time our students must take at least an introductory course in a non-Western culture.

TASK FORCE REPORT

Also on the bright side, I should tell you that last year there was established, on the recommendation of the Perkins Commission, a National Council on Foreign Language and International Studies, charged with the responsibility to continue and build on the work of the Commission.

Created with the support of private foundations, business corporations and government agencies, the Council, of which I am a member, is committed to the goal of making a coherent and persuasive case that foreign languages and international studies are crucial to the future of the United States.

You will, I am sure, be interested to know that very soon, the National Council on Foreign Language and International Studies will issue a report entitled, "National Manpower Targets for Advanced Research on Foreign Areas"—a report that analyzes in a careful and comprehensive way our need for more well-educated specialists concerned with foreign languages and areas.

The Task Force which prepared this document noted what it called "a silent but critical struggle to adjust to a changing world economy and a powerful set of new political and strategic realities." It said, "As measured by any reasonable standard of what we need to know about the rest of the world, we (the United States) are faltering badly."

The Task Force warned that "the vulnerability we invite by neglecting fundamental and applied knowledge and research about foreign areas threatens our security and our commercial, diplomatic and cultural interests. Though less visible, it is no less serious than the vulnerability we would face through neglect of our military preparedness."

NEED FOR MIDDLE EAST EXPERTS

With respect to the Middle East, the Task Force declared that there was no area of the world where it was more urgent that the United States be capable of understanding and dealing with events over the next few years. The Middle East, said the Task Force, was of such great economic and political importance that it was essential for the United States to have institutions and people expert on the region.

To date, these resources are lacking.

Currently, only 3,000 United States government employees are fluent in one of the seven Middle Eastern languages.

In American colleges and universities—the natural producers of specialists in foreign studies and the source of research and knowledge—the picture is much bleaker. According to the Task Force report, only 229 specialists currently teach or are engaged in research on Middle Eastern languages, literature and linguistics. Only 522 specialists are active in the vital subject of Middle East politics, geography, economics and sociology.

The Task Force on National Manpower Targets called for efforts to increase by more than 3,000 the number of academic specialists on the Middle East.

The Task Force also urged several steps to bring about an improved awareness of the Middle East to the American public.

These steps include: more emphasis in American high schools, colleges and universities on the history and problems of the Middle East; strengthened programs of foreign study and exchange at both the undergraduate and graduate levels; improved library collections related to Middle Eastern culture, history and languages.

POSITIVE INITIATIVES

Indeed, I have been impressed by initiatives already undertaken by a number of colleges and universities in the United States to advance international studies on their own campuses. The recent project on "Education and the World View," sponsored by the Council on Learning, has identified many of these innovative programs across the country.

Such creative initiatives will, in my view, continue to grow in importance. For the foreseeable future, Federal money for international education—or for other kinds of education, for that matter—is not likely to increase. Therefore, educational institutions will need to devise ways to share resources and ideas with one another.

I hope, too, that multi-national corporations and banks will increase their support of international studies and research.

Clearly, here is an area in which social and cultural responsibility coincide with enlightened self-interest.

There is one other facet of American life which gives me hope that, despite dwindling Federal dollars, we can move forward toward more effective international education. This is America's heterogeneous population. Our country is blessed with a remarkable resource of talent in our ethnic minorities, who, if brought into the mainstream of education and employment opportunities, can be expected to make new and valuable contributions to our national capacity to deal effectively with the world beyond our borders.

I see this phenomenon at work at New York University with its large multi-ethnic student population. Second and third generation Italian-Americans, Ukrainian-Americans, Greek-Americans are realizing that they do not want to lose their heritage. Many of them now enroll in language programs in order to reclaim the culture of their grandparents—an excellent base on which to build new and expanded programs.

NYU AND ISRAEL

Allow me, as I conclude, to tell you of the deep commitment of New York University to international education. We have, I believe, an impressive range of international studies. I shall recite only programs involving Israel, although, of course, our University has many programs with other nations around the world.

Our Hagop Kevorkian Center for Near Eastern Studies brings together historians, archaeologists, economists, art historians and other experts engaged in interdisciplinary work on the Middle East. Our department in Near Eastern Languages and Literatures offers a full range of courses in Biblical, medieval and modern Hebrew language and literature as well as history and social science courses about the Middle East, including Israel.

We have on our faculty one of the major interpreters of the Dead Sea Scrolls—Professor Lawrence Schiffman—and one of America's most eminent Biblical scholars—Professor Baruch Levine.

New York University, incidentally, was one of the first universities in America to include Hebrew language and literature and Judaic culture and civilization in its curriculum. Our School of Education offered its first courses in modern Hebrew fifteen years before the establishment of the State of Israel and offered a broad array of courses in Hebrew culture and education.

The Institute for Hebrew and Judaic Studies and the Hagop Kevorkian Center for Near Eastern Studies are jointly playing a major role in the archaeological excavations at the ancient city of Tel Dor, eighteen miles from Haifa.

Furthermore, the international program of our Graduate School of Business Administration, which is ranked first in the country by many, has for many years enjoyed a close relationship with the Recanate Graduate School of Business Administration of Tel Aviv University.

Our School of Law offers a variety of courses in international law and affairs, including special institutes for lawyers from abroad. This week, faculty from our Law School, under the leadership of Dean Norman Redlich, are visiting Israel for two separate projects. Our School of Law and

Tel Aviv University are co-sponsoring a conference there for deans and other legal educators from the United States, Israel and other countries. In addition, New York University law faculty are engaged in preliminary talks to arrange a conference on technology transfer between Israel and Egypt. For the past decade, our School of Law has annually invited a professor from the Hebrew University to join our faculty for the academic year.

The NYU-Israeli Educational Exchange Program at our Medical Center sponsors regular faculty and student exchanges with three medical institutions in Israel—the Sackler School of Medicine at Tel Aviv University, the Tel Hashomer Hospital and Barsheba Medical Center in Jersualem.

Finally, our Graduate School of Public Administration and the Civil Service Commission of Israel co-sponsor the Administrative Staff College of Israel, headquartered in Jerusalem. The College offers courses in managerial behavior and organizational theory to Israeli administrators, legislators and other public officials.

Last fall, when I delivered my inaugural address as thirteenth President of New York University, I said that one of my principal objectives for our University would be to strengthen international studies and research.

It is my intention to see our existing such programs grow while at the same time creating new initiatives. We have a remarkable base on which to build. Located as we are in New York City—the international capital of commerce, the arts, the sciences and communications—we are in an ideal situation to develop New York University as one of America's leading centers of international education.

SADAT CHAIR AT NYU

As evidence of the commitment of New York University to the pivotal role of international studies, I am pleased today to announce our plans to establish at the University a Mohamed Anwar-El Sadat Chair in Diplomacy.

The creation of the Anwar-El Sadat Professorship would, in our view, be an appropriate way to honor the historic initiative which President Sadat took four years ago in journeying to Jerusalem in the cause of peace.

The Professorship would be devoted to the study of how nations can resolve their differences by negotiations rather than war and provide deeper insights to us all into the major diplomatic issues of our time.

As my colleagues in New York and I envisage it, the Chair would be based at New York University but Anwar-El Sadat professors would give lectures and conduct symposia at universities in both Israel and Egypt as well as New York City.

It is our intention to invite as occupants of the Chair distinguished statesmen and scholars from both the United States and abroad. They would reflect, teach and write about their experiences. Appointments would be for one to two years.

I have already discussed the proposed Chair with educational leaders in Israel and have been most encouraged by their response. Next week I shall be in Cairo where I intend also to seek reactions from university officials there.

Certainly, I welcome any suggestions for the implementation of a Sadat Professorship that any of you may have.

Let me conclude my remarks today by saying simply that it must be evident that so perilous is our common life on this precious Earth that we must, all of us, commit every fiber or our minds and spirits to the quest for a stable peace and a world of freedom and justice.

To be able effectively to pursue this most important of objectives, however, we must know and understand one another, at least know more and understand more than we do today.

I believe that there is a special responsibility on the part of the colleges and universities of the United States to help educate the American people about the other peoples of the world who, after all, populate most of it.

The distinguished American statesman who gave his name to the program we are meeting today to celebrate put the case I am making in terse but eloquent words. Senator J. William Fulbright said: "Education is a slow-moving but powerful force. It may not be fast enough or strong enough to save us from catastrophe, but it is the strongest force available."

THE BBC'S ROBERT McKENZIE: A MOVING TRIBUTE

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, with the untimely passing of Robert McKenzie, the world lost an incomparable broadcast journalist and I lost a dear friend of more than three decades.

His life—devoted as it was to the subject of politics and reporting—made him one of the best of the BBC, and for a generation, he took the intricacy of American politics to his viewers in Britain and helped them appreciate and understand what our world of policymaking is all about. Born and raised in Canada, Bob McKenzie had the advantage, perhaps, of proximity in unraveling the mysteries of American politics, but he also had the depth, the intellect, and the scholarly ability to help others learn more about America than what they could capture from headlines.

Mr. President, Bob McKenzie was a great friend of America and a great friend of democracy and his loss shall be mourned. I ask unanimous consent that a tribute to Bob McKenzie, delivered at Church of Christ the King, Crown Square, on December 7, 1981, by Sir Huw Wheldon, be entered at this point in the RECORD:

There being no objection, the tribute was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROBERT MCKENZIE: MEMORIAL SERVICE

I am only sorry that the words that have been spoken and written both formally and informally, about Bob McKenzie since his untimely death were not spoken to him. He served two great institutions, LSE and the BBC; he served them virtually throughout his adult life; and he served them to the top of his bent.

Sooner or later one or the other or both would have done him honour, but somehow this never quite happened during his lifetime. Perhaps it was that he always seemed young. He retained his youthful qualities of intensity and curiosity and ebullience, apparently quite unimpaired by passing years. Until very recently even his appearance remained youthful.

Or perhaps it was as if he was himself too brisk, too busy, always so inward with his work, for anyone to consider making a proper finished appraisal of either work or a life which was still so energetically in midstream. But the fact is, that over the years, almost invisibly as it were, he had come to occupy a very special place indeed in the life of LSE, in the life of the BBC and in the political life of the country itself; not to mention the place he occupied in the hearts and minds of a host of friends and colleagues and well-wishers.

For all his discerning intelligence, and he was a very clever man, I think he would have been amazed at the respect and the affection in which he was held.

As we all know, Politics was the passion of his life. He could be said, I think to have fallen in love as a young man from Vancouver, with the constitutional and political institutions and practices of this country; and characteristically the young Captain McKenzie, immediately after the war, wasted no time in getting to grips with them. Not to waste anything was quite central to his character, I think.

He lived, as I saw things, a curiously spare and even monkish life. His manner, and indeed his disposition, was exuberance itself. His rooms in Brompton Square presented a genial and generous clutter of books and papers; just as, in his hands, his garden in Walton blossomed, His zest for the matter-at-hand, almost whatever it was, seemed unquenchable. But he wasted nothing. His teaching at LSE bore upon his programmes. His head-on meetings with political figures and political events in programmes bore upon his University work. His life was all of a piece. It was very highly focussed and it was extremely productive.

I worked closely with him in the mid-fifties. I was then approaching 40 years of age, and I was fairly new to the BBC and I had landed up as a Producer in the old Television Talks and Current Affairs Department in Lime Grove. I was a year older than Bob, but he, by comparison, was already a very experienced broadcaster. He had worked in radio in the General Overseas Service and in the North American Service. He had been produced by a variety of budding luminaries who have since gone their separate ways—Donald Baverstock and Roger Cary; Derek Holroyde and Tony Benn. He had been a CBC Stringer for many years. He was already one of an extremely notable and pioneering group of reporters—they included James Cameron, Chester Wilmot, Geoffrey Cox, William Clarke, Sydney Jacobsen and others who were working on a daily radio programme—a new departure in itself—called TOPIC FOR TONIGHT which had been started by Stephen Bonarjee and Charles Curran. All this was in the early fifties and by the mid-Fifties he was becoming a familiar figure in the Television Studios as well.

We worked on two big documentary series at that time. He and I wrote them together. They were called Portraits of Power, and I mention them only in order to testify as to his gifts as a working companion. I was in and out of his flat day in, day out, over a period of eighteen months and I have a hundred memories—of his glee when things took an unexpected and rewarding turn; of his despair, loud and cheerful, when things went wrong; of his tenacity where issues were concerned; his clarity of mind; and his quite encyclopaedic knowledge.

He was a marvelous man to work with and there are many people in his Church who would testify strongly to the same effect.

All through his long life in broadcasting he relished the working sessions which are inseparable from the preparation and the making of programmes. They were his heart's delight.

He would come bustling in, bubbling over at once with some new idea, or some new disclosure, or best of all, some new piece of gossip. He liked the swift modulations from the reflective to the executive; from theory to action. He adored lengthy and thorough analyses and anything that would eventually require explanation.

But once the purpose was achieved, the matter settled, he'd be off, brisk as ever, all instincts of sociability satisfied and, as a matter of fact, many a friendship bound yet more securely.

There is a famous BBC Cable quoted in seminars and Training Courses and the like. It was sent, in 1954, simultaneously to David Butler who was in Berkeley in California and to Robert McKenzie who was in New York.

The cable concerned the first-ever television coverage of a Conservative Party Conference, and it read as follows:

"Conservative Conference arrangements now firm STOP. You at Blackpool William Clarke London STOP. Rehearsals October 6 Transmission October 7 8 and 9 STOP. Introduction and Interviews from Blackpool but Controversy Disallowed STOP. Details and Contract on your return."

Connoisseurs of BBC hierarchical practice and the precise definition of authority—and they certainly included Bob McKenzie—might be interested to learn that the signature at the end of the Cable was Goldie oblique stroke Peacock.

"Controversy Disallowed" Bob's work in radio had already reflected his determination to make politics come alive by interviewing Ministers and their Shadows, despite the old Fourteen Day rule which forbad discussion on the air within 14 days of a Parliamentary debate; and he was to prove no less determined and successful in television. He had no sensationalism in mind, nor anything trivial. He was absolutely dedicated to the proposition that the country needed an informed public, and informed public discussion of political issues; and he was tireless in sharing that enthusiasm with anybody willing to listen, including colleagues, pupils and audiences, in congregations of anything from one or two to tens of millions.

And it was in the name of this all-consuming concern that he worked in a quite extraordinary range of programmes. He was delighted when he was invited, quite late in his life, to take part in Nationwide. He was a reporter and a populariser and a journalist and happy to be so described; yet in these callings he never traduced his academic standards nor betrayed his own values.

Nationwide has a huge audience. Bob carried out brief four or five minute items and interviews if called upon to do so, as readily and as capably as he conducted long, detailed and specialised explorations with political leaders in his last BBC2 Series, or in earlier years, in Gallery. Then there were the extraordinary Marathons of the General Elections with his famous and endearing Swingometer; and again, on a quite different level of experience for him, and for us, there were the hours, eight of nine hours, of political insight and recollection he drew out of Mr. Harold MacMillan. And so much more, including Radio.

It is not surprising that Mr. MacMillan was moved to make so full and touching a statement to the Times on the day after Bob's death. "He was an old friend", he said, and made reference to his common sense, and his grasp of political history over the last 100 years, his courtesy, his learning, so nicely concealed under a light touch. There have been many messages from public men and women all over the world. Many of them LSE people, of course, as well as personal friends, but all a reminder that Bob himself, out of the public eye as well as in it, cut ice.

As many, perhaps most people here will remember, his entry in Who's Who for some years set out his academic career, nearly all LSE, and his academic publications; and the only reference to radio and television was: "Recreation-Broadcasting".

And it did re-create him, of course. But the fact remains that he was a central and influential figure in a group of men and women who transformed political broadcasting in this country.

His foundation was his urge to communicate and share his abiding vision of a Society dedicated to constitutional government.

His talent was to be able to conduct himself in a whole variety of roles. He was technically very adept. He could write and comment and interview and explain and narrate; do so with careful preparation, and do so off the cuff; do so short, and do so long. He was extremely resourceful.

And his gift was to be able to carry this in the presence, and to the satisfaction of all sorts of audiences—informed and uninformed, old and young, big and small. All were addressed in the same voice, with the same relish to get the complex clear, reducing nothing.

He is much missed already. He was missed at Croydon and he was missed at Crosby. But even in professional terms there is a much greater dimension to the loss. It was his beloved Bagehot who said that in an advanced country public discussion had to be endured; and Bob McKenzie was a major voice and a major practitioner in seeing to it, during the last 25 years that broadcasting was brought out of its Reithian constraints to take its proper and responsible part in that great activity.

To be free from constraints is one thing, however. To use that freedom to good purpose is another. There are difficulties ahead. "The Country divided" said Oliver Wrinkley years ago in a great sentence "The Country divided puts the BBC on a rack". No broadcasting organization in any country could afford to lose so experienced a voice, such academic rigour, such technical capacity and such constant purpose at any time and particularly now. He will be very much missed, and the more so in confused and troubled days, because all brilliance and technicality apart, there was wisdom in him too.

I read in an essay by the Baroness Blixen of a Chinese Mandarin who had been charged with the education of a young Prince. When the Prince reached the age of 20 he was released from his studies. The Mandarin told him he had taught him all he knew. As a parting gift he gave the young Prince a ring to wear on his finger. There was, he said, an inscription inside; and he asked the young man to wear the ring always, and to look at the inscription only at moments of great Triumph, or great Disaster. The Prince wore the ring, and as his life passed he was visited, as we all are, by moments of joy and moments of sorrow and on those occasions he would read the inscription which said, "This too shall pass."

And above and beyond and alongside his energy and his full commitments, the commitment of his whole life, in fact, there was something of this quality in Bob. He was never fooled. In some ways it is quite odd to be remembering him in a Church. He was, in my judgement, implacably secular. Reason and rationality were his foundations.

And yet, I am also glad that we have been here and are here. The Readings, great texts, were much to the point.

"Therefore get wisdom
"And with all thy getting, get understanding
"Therefore be ye steadfast
"Unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord."

They go straight to the point; and the Church provides the context which these texts demand.

And finally, being here allows us straightforwardly to thank God for a life so full of activity and purpose; and allows us to be grateful to have played our parts in the days of a man undeniably solitary, and equally undeniably fruitful: for which God's name be praised.

PRIVATE AND PUBLIC SECTORS: PARTNERS FOR NEW YORK

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, we have, as a nation, been devoting more attention of late to the proposition that government and the private sector can cooperate in addressing significant policy questions of importance to our cities.

To this end, New York City Partnership was established 3 years ago—an effort to draw together business, civic, and government leaders with a profound concern for our country's largest and, indeed, preeminent city. The Partnership has developed, in these last years, into an association of more than 100 business and private sector leaders who are convinced that solutions to New York City's problems can come in part from sources other than the Federal Government.

Under the chairmanship of David Rockefeller and the presidency of Arthur Taylor, New York City Partnership has launched several ambitious projects with splendid potential for boosting the economy of the city. The Partnership's efforts have had, and will continue to have, a most beneficial impact on those who live and work in New York and those who enjoy its unique charm.

On Thursday, January 14, 1982, President Ronald Reagan made a special trip to the city to remark upon the Partnership's meaning for New York and the Nation. On that occasion, Arthur Taylor delivered a spirited and thoughtful commentary on the role business can play in revitalizing New York City and, indeed, the entire Nation. His conclusion, expanding upon a remark of one of President

Reagan's predecessors, was that, "The business of business is America."

Mr. President, I thought my colleagues would benefit from seeing Mr. Taylor's remarks and from learning more about New York City Partnership, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that the text of Mr. Taylor's speech on January 14, 1982, and a description of the Partnership be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ARTHUR R. TAYLOR, NYC PARTNERSHIP SPEECH

Mr. President, David, fellow partners and friends of the partnership, shortly after the beginning of the year 1925 in a speech before the Society of American Newspaper Editors (in fact, almost 57 years ago to the day), President Coolidge made his famous statement, "The business of America is business." Of course, in the more than half century that has passed, we have learned that the business of America is much more than business. To expect over 200 million people to govern themselves in a dangerous world without great difficulty, to rely upon education to effect enlightened compromise of self-interest without great difficulty, is not realistic. If occasionally the difficulties overwhelm us, we should not be surprised.

We have also learned that the Nation has responsibilities to see that there is fairness and justice in the distribution of obligations and in the rewards of being an American. This is especially true of those who are at the bottom of the economic ladder.

We are now engaged in a momentous process in which our Government is reducing its responsibilities for such things. This in no way means that society's responsibility is reduced. If the people feel that their Government must pull back, then others must be prepared to fill the gap.

The New York City partnership was formed to fill the gap because David Rockefeller and others in this room decided that the business of business here is New York City. Without safe streets, adequate transportation, jobs for our children, effective courts and schools, the cost of carrying on business is such that it would be too high to absorb. The partnership is committed and involved in all of these areas, with the additional knowledge that the ability to lobby for our views, to promote our point of view, to assault through knowledge, is the key to its future.

We know that when the black community, the Hispanic and Chinese communities, the small business community, join with the big business community—when Staten Island makes common cause with Manhattan—that our call for action is stronger and more effective than it has ever been before.

We are learning in New York City that we desperately need each other. All except the most selfish of us find it necessary to change our views to find a course of accommodation with those around us. We feel this necessity for our needs are so great.

We are at the very beginning of the reality of a true public/private intersection of activities. We are obligated to see that it works. We need to have a working linkage between Federal and private sources so that a true partnership may exist.

President Coolidge had the words right when he said, "The business of America is business," the words are right but they are in the wrong order. For what I think we are out to demonstrate is, "the business of business is America."

NEW YORK CITY PARTNERSHIP

New York City Partnership is an association of more than 100 business and civic leaders who are convinced that the expertise and experience of the organized private sector can improve the economic and social climate in America's preeminent city.

The Partnership was founded in 1979, after New York had survived a period during which it teetered on the edge of bankruptcy, cut municipal jobs and services, and saw construction, office occupancy, and its credit rating plummet. Businesses large and small fled, while national politicians turned their backs on the city, pronouncing it a basket case.

That dire analysis overlooked New York's greatest asset, its people—the fiber from which the "basket" was woven. When things seemed most grim, New Yorkers pooled their abundant talents. Labor, government, voluntary associations, and the private sector, which often had warred against one another, devoted themselves to New York City's survival. Unions purchased city debt obligations and corporations loaned top executive talent to help run city agencies.

This collaboration helped restore much of New York's vitality. It also persuaded commercial and civic leaders that a permanent partnership could benefit the city even after the crisis had eased. Under the chairmanship of David Rockefeller and presidency of Arthur R. Taylor, they formed the New York City Partnership, an umbrella organization that drew together such established private-sector groups as the 200-year-old Chamber of Commerce and Industry and the widely respected Economic Development Council, a research and service agency.

The Partnership's members have come from all corners of the city, reflecting the diverse local talent, ethnicity, and politics that are the source of New York's dynamism. They have devoted themselves to aiding New York, gratis, with such projects as these:

REVITALIZING MASS TRANSPORTATION

Responding to a call from officials of New York's faltering transit system, the Partnership has begun providing the city with the managerial and technical expertise needed to get the subways and buses running reliably again. Currently, some 20 executives on loan to the Partnership from major corporations are working full time with the Transit Authority.

YOUTH EMPLOYMENT

A Partnership task force this past summer gained commitments for nearly 14,000 jobs in 1,800 private businesses for the city's economically disadvantaged youngsters. No private-sector job creation program on so massive a scale had been accomplished previously.

The Partnership has also set up a task force to aid New York's efforts to combat street crime and another to stimulate economic development.

The activities of the Partnership are establishing a model for urban America. Inquiries have already begun coming in from around the nation, from cities eager to emulate New York by setting up private-public partnerships to tackle local problems locally.

RESPECT FOR THE CIVIL SERVICE

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, were it not for a trained and highly professional civil service, this Nation's government would accomplish little of significance. That is a statement perhaps not so remarkable but one we should note on occasion, as it seems that the Federal bureaucracy is often blamed for everything about Government which malfunctions.

Mr. Murray Comarow, professor in residence at the American University and the former Executive Director of the President's Council on Executive Organization, has contributed a thoughtful and highly informed article on precisely that subject in a recent issue of the Washington Post. He writes elegantly of the attacks upon the Federal civil service emanating from the present administration, and he notes that the bureaucracy would have much of import to contribute to the vital discussions of policy now underway, if only those in office had the respect to listen. Listen we should and for that reason, among others, I offer for my colleagues' consideration the fine article from the Post authored by Murray Comarow.

I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Oct. 31, 1981]

CIVIL SERVANTS: WAR AND PEACE

(By Murray Comarow)

"Baiting Bureaucrats: The White House steps up its gibes at civil servants. Reagan needles them in nearly every speech, all but calling them lazy,"—Wall Street Journal's Washington Wire, Sept. 18, 1981.

At 1 p.m. on Sept. 25, 1981, Edwin Meese III, considered second only to the president in authority, began a speech to a group of senior bureaucrats at a Marriott Hotel in Virginia. Meese said, "I can't think of any more important group in government except possibly the Cabinet. . . . I have a real appreciation, as does the president, of the value of this group."

At 9 that evening, in his fifth major television address, President Reagan gibed that some programs benefited "those who administer them rather than those who were the intended beneficiaries," and told a funny story, with bureaucrats the butt of the joke.

Reagan has fulminated against "the advocates of a different philosophy [who] are manning the barricades in those puzzle palaces on the Potomac." He has described "one of the most remote, protected areas of our country: the federal bureaucracy in Washington."

In light of the president's relentless public attack on career civil servants, what are we to make of Meese's words of praise and comfort?

The president and his sheer chutzpah aside, the explanation may be found in an ambivalence about bureaucrats within the minds of our recently elected leaders. Reagan's dominant image is that of bureaucrats who have their own agendas; who are allied with congressional staff and client groups to sabotage political initiatives; who are not that bright or creative (or they'd be out making money, right?); and who are, above all, survival specialists.

The opposite picture of career executives as competent and indispensable is being slowly absorbed by some of the Reagan team as they learn their jobs, gain respect for their staffs and relay their discoveries up the line.

The dominant image—government people as disloyal and incompetent—is the product of ritual-level thinking (e.g., "politicians are crooks," or "Mexicans are lazy") buttressed by undeniable anecdotal evidence. Of course there are government executives who are less than competent. Of course some have conspired with committee staffs and special interests to resist budget cuts. When bureaucrats exceed the bounds of propriety, they should be disciplined or dismissed.

In truth, however, such excesses are infrequent. Bureaucrats want to be trusted; they want their experience to count; they want to be part of the action. When they are appreciated, they are overwhelmingly loyal and effective. Shutting them out, much less maligning them, produces the very mind-set that Reagan and Co. predicted coming in—a classic case of self-fulfilling prophecy.

But what kind of a voice should senior civil servants have? They were not, after all, elected by the 26 percent of the American voters who gave the president his mandate for change. The issue is distorted by Donald Devine, head of the Office of Personnel Management, who says things such as "the task of the civil service is to administer and manage, not to determine policy." He cites with reverence Max Weber, a German sociologist, who half a century ago tended to see employees as interchangeable parts. Public administration today has moved as far from Weber as psychiatry has moved from early Freud, a development that may have escaped Devine, whose own management experience is not readily apparent.

Still, Devine is right: civil servants should not, determine policy. Nor do they believe they should, with a scattering of dissidents at the margins. They do believe, however, that their experience should be placed at the disposal of elected and appointed policy makers, and seriously considered. That done, the vast majority will earnestly try to carry out whatever plan is decided upon.

Devine does not just talk. He acts out his limited and unfortunate view of the role of career people. First, he has surrounded himself with a cadre of personal loyalists, a sure sign of insecurity and distrust of career staff, leading to insulation from differing views. And meetings with senior staff tend to be for the purpose of giving him information, not opinions or alternatives. The staff is generally dismissed without being informed of Devine's reaction or decisions.

Many of Reagan's Cabinet officers have learned that their career staffers are first rate. Among those appreciating the value of senior careerists are the likes of Attorney General William French Smith, Secretary of the Treasury Donald Regan and Interior Secretary James Watt. (Watt? Yes, Watt.)

The combined effects of the Reagan-Devine treatment and the pay cap may be devastating. Many of the best people are leaving Treasury reported to Congress that it is at a "severe disadvantage in recruiting from business." Interior said it is hard to attract executives; fewer excellent people want in; early retirements are up. At NASA, turnover of senior people in 1979 was 6 percent; it now runs about 20 percent. Less experienced people are monitoring contracts running to billions of dollars and are supervising programs affecting millions of citizens. On the other side of the table are the sharpest minds in industry: Can we really expect inexperienced people to safeguard the public interest?

Or do you suppose that appointed people like Devine can do the job with the half-hearted support of the men and women who have been scorned, excoriated and—the ultimate put down—patronized by men like Meese who must believe that civil servants can neither read, hear nor remember.

THE PRESIDENT, CONGRESS, AND PUBLIC POLICIES

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, Walter Shapiro's article in the Washington Post "Outlook" section on Sunday, lampooning the President's recent awkward media responses by contriving for him an imaginary state of the Union address, is not nearly as ridiculous as the facts reported in the front page story by Joe Pichirallo and Margaret Shapiro, and in Hobart Rowen's "Economic Impact" business section column.

The front page news tells about a local financier who gleans 104 percent interest payments on loans to desperate businesses or developers by charging 2 percent interest per week. Law enforcement officers give a lot of attention to one of the practices of organized crime—loan sharking—where money loaned at similar interest rates is collected by force. What kind of legal system do we tolerate on high interest rates? Such a legal business practice of 104 percent interest assures either rampant inflation or businesses and developers who borrow money at such costs will likely go bankrupt.

Hobart Rowen's business section article describes Japan's clever protectionist tactics to eliminate imports. This specific case involves baseball bats, where the specifications required by the Japanese Government can be met by only six manufacturers, who are, happily for them, all Japanese. "No Louisville Sluggers, thank you; we Japanese will protect our own."

The ridiculous part is that, with our markets wide open to Japanese imports of everything from stereos to steel, and a continual $10 to $20 billion imbalance in trade in their favor, we complacently let our economy slide into recession with 9 to 10 percent unemployment bulging the 1982 Federal deficit from the $42 billion projected by the Office of Management and Budget in July to a January estimate of $109 billion.

The imaginary state of the Union address by Walter Shapiro was clever, biting wit that bruises but draws no blood. The two news items report on a clever business lender and a clever trade partner. It can only be concluded that we, the United States of America, are foolish for our high interest rate and unbalanced trade policies. The unemployed, our struggling businesses and sinking industries, including agriculture, are not just bruised by these failed policies—they are bleeding, and the result is a huge increase in the Federal deficit that is a massive national hemorrhage.

We need a tourniquet, some quick economic transfusions, and different prescriptions for interest rates and trade policies. Hopefully, President Reagan's state of the Union message recommends and Congress considers actions for prompt economic remedies.

TRIBUTE TO R. FRANK MUNDY, PRESIDENT AND PUBLISHER OF THE GREENWOOD INDEX-JOURNAL

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today to pay tribute to R. Frank Mundy, president and publisher of the Greenwood Index-Journal newspaper, who passed away on January 4, 1982. To his devoted wife, Eleanor, and daughter Judi Burns, I extend my deepest heartfelt sympathy.

The life of Frank Mundy was a shining testimony of how our great American free enterprise system allows anyone the opportunity to achieve his goals through persistence and hard work. He began his career in journalism as a courier with the Greenwood Index-Journal, and in time rose to the summit of this fine publication, serving as its sole owner. Frank took full advantage of the opportunity to not only advance in his profession but to excel with a quality product of fair journalism that illustrated the highest commitment to honesty and integrity.

His daughter, Judi, once said that he "firmly believed in every person doing his own work and carrying his own load as best he could." Frank Mundy always carried his own load, and often the burdens of others as best he could. He was a true gentleman who, throughout his life, displayed the unique ability of getting a job done quietly and effectively.

His life reflected his dedication to serving others. He served others through his involvement with numerous community and State organizations. He served his country well as an ensign in the U.S. Naval Reserve, where he earned four battle stars in World War II. He served the newspaper industry with great skill as publisher of the Index-Journal, and as the first and only president of the South Carolina Press Association Foundation, Inc. His contributions toward the improvement of journalism in South Carolina were so significant that the board of directors of the foundation renamed their organization the R. Frank Mundy Newspaper Foundation, Inc.

Much of his service to others, personally and professionally, may be directly attributed to his relationship with God, whom he served first and foremost. His involvement in various church, community, and civic activities was an extension of his service and duty to his God.

R. Frank Mundy set an exemplary life of selfless and untiring hard work, dedicated to making life better for everyone around him.

Mr. President, in order to share with my colleagues the contributions of this outstanding South Carolina citizen, whose friendship I cherished for many years, I ask unanimous consent that one article and four editorials by fellow journalists throughout the State be included in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Greenwood Index-Journal, Jan. 5, 1982]

MUNDY ACTIVE IN COMMUNITY

R. Frank Mundy, who died Monday night, had long been active in Greenwood civil and business affairs.

Recently, he was honored by the South Carolina Press Association Foundation for his contributions to his profession, his community and his fellowman. In citing those contributions and achievements, Dean Livingston of Orangeburg, vice president of the Foundation, presented a detailed picture of how involved Mr. Mundy was. Livingston's statement said:

R. Frank Mundy is one of those rare individuals who accomplish so much that it's hard to keep track of everything they do. And, like so many of those who contribute so much for their fellowman, Frank has been true to a pattern of doing it while keeping a low profile. He has been a mover and shaker in his city, his state and his profession. And, he has done it quietly, seeking no recognition or special favors in return.

Frank is, of course, a native of Greenwood where he began his career as a carrier for The Index-Journal. He attended local schools, the Junior College of Augusta, and was graduated from the University of South Carolina with a BA degree in economics.

He was commissioned an ensign in the U.S. Naval Reserve and received four battle stars in the South Pacific during World War II. He is a member of the inactive reserve with the rank of full lieutenant.

Frank had experience in the circulation department of The State newspaper of Columbia and after the war returned to Greenwood as circulation manager of The Index-Journal. He later became business manager of the newspaper which he now owns and operates as president and publisher.

Frank is married to the former Eleanor Metts. They have one daughter, Mrs. James C. Burns III of Greenwood, and three grandchildren.

In addition to all his other pursuits, Frank has found time to teach the Men's Bible Class of First Baptist Church, of which he is a member and has served the church in many ways.

Frank has been a walking promotion for Greenwood and South Carolina, singing their praises everywhere he has been. It's safe to say that no one loves his home town and home state more than Frank Mundy.

A look at some of the work he has done for his community and his state gives only a glimpse of the scope of his interests and his efforts to serve his neighbors. Among his activities, he has:

—Served as president of the Salvation Army Board.

—Served as president of the Community Chest.

—Served as president of the YMCA Board.

—Served as president of the Lions Club.

—Served as president of the Chamber of Commerce.

—Served as president of the Lander College Foundation Board and as a Lander College trustee, for which he was recently honored.

—Served as president of the Self Memorial Hospital Board of Trustees.

—Served as treasurer of Cambridge Academy.

In all of these undertakings, it would be impossible to describe how much Frank has meant. The hours of service would be astounding, and not only have they benefited Greenwood but, in many cases, the entire state.

There are other areas where Frank has made a mark. He has served as a director of the South Carolina Chamber of Commerce, on the State Board of Financial Institutions and as president of the South Carolina Press Association and the Mid-Atlantic Circulation Managers Association.

It's almost unbelievable that one man could accomplish so much. But in addition to all this—and more—there is another area in which Frank has been the driving force. That is the South Carolina Press Association Foundation, which he serves as president. In reality, had it not been for the leadership of Frank Mundy, the Press Foundation would not be what it is today.

It is, then, an honor and a privilege to announce that the other members of the Board of Directors of the South Carolina Press Association Foundation have unanimously determined that the organization will hereafter be named the "R. Frank Mundy Newspaper Foundation, Inc."

[From the Greenville News, Jan. 5, 1982]

R. FRANK MUNDY

R. Frank Mundy began a newspaper career in his youth as a carrier for his hometown paper, the Greenwood Index-Journal. He capped it as president and publisher of the paper. Along the way he made important contributions to his city and state, and to newspapering as a public service.

His work in Greenwood touched practically every facet of community life, especially health care and educational institutions. His advice was sought by state leaders on financial and other matters.

The quiet but forceful Frank Mundy became an institution in his own time. He served as president of the South Carolina Press Association and as a founding member and only president of the association's foundation. It's appropriate that recently the latter was named the R. Frank Mundy Newspaper Foundation.

Frank Mundy's attractive personality and unselfish community and professional activities, earned him many friends who are saddened by his death at age 66.

PRESS LEADER PASSES ON

One of the state's finest newspaper publishers and a leader in improving South Carolina journalism died Monday.

R. Frank Mundy, president and publisher of the Greenwood Index-Journal, began his newspaper career in Greenwood as a carrier and worked his way to the top, becoming sole owner of the Index-Journal following the deaths of his partners, W. W. Wilson and Ed Chaffin. The Index-Journal is one of only three independently-owned newspapers in South Carolina, the other two being the Rock Hill Evening Herald and The Sumter Daily Item.

Mr. Mundy was a former president of the S.C. Press Association but left his most indelible mark on state journalism as the first and only president of the S.C. Press Association Foundation Inc., renamed the R. Frank Mundy Newpaper Foundation Inc. last year by his board of directors in honor of his contributions.

The foundation, under the leadership of Mr. Mundy, developed and sponsored workshops, seminars, scholarships and other special projects, all designed to improve newspaper journalism in South Carolina, which they have.

Frank Mundy did as much for his community as he did for journalism in South Carolina, holding leadership positions in numerous organizations in Greenwood, including president of the Lander College Foundation and a Lander College trustee, and president of the Self Memorial Hospital Board of Trustees.

A soft-spoken, congenial man with a first-rate mind and outstanding leadership qualities, Mr. Mundy's death at the age of 66 has left not only a void in statewide journalism but also in his community. Through hard work and sheer ability he rose to the top of his profession, and he will be sorely missed.

[From the Greenwood Index-Journal, Jan. 6, 1982]

R. FRANK MUNDY

One of those distinguishing qualities of men which sets them apart is a capacity for getting things done without a whole lot of fanfare . . . while all the time piling up accomplishment after accomplishment with such subtlety that, along the way, few realize just how much is achieved. Frank Mundy was one of those men.

Through the years, Frank gave so much time and effort to Greenwood that when it is viewed in perspective, it paints a revealing picture of a man who was in love with his hometown and all of its people. He cared and cared deeply. That's obvious. Looking over the many activities in which he was involved—the list is a reflection of progress in Greenwood—it is quickly apparent that Frank Mundy placed his community's interests only after those of his God and his family.

In addition to his numerous civic contributions, covering everything from Lander College to Self Memorial Hospital to the Chamber of Commerce—the record goes on and on—Frank Mundy was, perhaps, the number one cheerleader for Greenwood. Seldom did he speak with anyone that somewhere, somehow in the conversation he didn't manage to get in a good word about Greenwood. To him, there was no better place to be found and he let the world know it.

As much as he was committed to Greenwood, so too was he committed to people . . . and when he made a commitment, you could be sure it would be kept. Letting people down was foreign to his nature.

Frank died Monday after an extended battle with cancer. But his identity and his mark will be part of Greenwood and the Index-Journal as long as they exist. His giving and caring cannot be overstated.

His family will feel the loss most of all, for the love they shared was filled with the warmth and the closeness that only families can know. But his kind of caring will be missed by us all, for it too seldom comes our way.

Frank Mundy had a good life. He worked hard, achieved much and gave of himself more than could rightfully or reasonably be expected. By any yardstick, his life measures up to the best of the human soul; especially the eternal part. It is that eternal quality that, encouragingly, gives us the measure of a man who cared . . . and loved people.

[From the State, Jan. 7, 1982]

R. FRANK MUNDY

Shortly after World War II, three newspapermen, W. W. Wilson, J. Ed Chaffin, and R. Frank Mundy, teamed up to purchase the Greenwood Index-Journal. Theirs was an unusual partnership, and a successful one.

Mr. Wilson was experienced in newspaper advertising; Mr. Chaffin was a newsman, Mr. Mundy was experienced in circulation and in business. Their complementary talents and abilities were recognized at the outset of their ownership by the late Greenwood banker, Dewey H. Johnson, who offered to lend them money to buy the newspaper without any collateral.

Mr. Johnson's faith in the men was justified. They built a sturdy and respected community newspaper which cares about and serves its audience.

Frank Mundy died Monday, the last surviving partner of a spirited journalistic enterprise in which he took great pride. Mr. Mundy will be remembered for his many professional and community activities, but he should be remembered foremost for publishing a responsible newspaper in the finest tradition of the American press.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. QUAYLE:

S. 2008. A bill to amend the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 to provide for a 2-year budget process, to provide for timely oversight of authorizing legislation and appropriations and for other purposes; pursuant to the order of August 4, 1977, referred jointly to the Committee on the Budget and the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

TWO-YEAR BUDGET PROCESS

● Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation which will replace the current annual budget cycle with a 2-year budget process.

The 1974 Budget Act requires two budget resolutions each year, which allows too little time for consideration of authorization and appropriations bills, and too little time for program oversight.

Since passage of the Budget Act, the first and second budget resolution deadlines have been met only twice out of 10 reporting dates.

Our record on appropriations has been equally dismal. Since 1976, the first year in which the Budget Act actually went into operation, only once were all appropriations bills enacted by the beginning of the fiscal year. Even in that year a continuing resolution was needed to fund some programs. Over the past 5 years, 10 continuing resolutions have been enacted. Today, much of the Federal Government is still operating on the basis of a continuing resolution.

We clearly need more time for consideration of authorization and appropriation bills. Our authorization processes need to be strengthened so programs can effectively be reviewed and evaluated. The work of oversight committees needs to be integrated into the work of the appropriations committees as well as into the budget.

Only by providing all of our committees with sufficient time and our full, undivided attention can we regain fuller control of our legislative, budget, and appropriations process. Only then can the budget we pass be based on full economic review of legislative proposals as well as the economic considerations of the moment.

The ability of Congress to gain control over the budget is today in serious doubt. The weight of prior-year obligations and automatic expenditures built into the budget is causing us to drown in a sea of increasing deficits.

Unless we can correct this situation, we will have effectively lost our power to legislate in any meaningful sense. Government will continue to operate on a kind of "automatic pilot," without meaningful evaluation of current policy by the legislative branch and with the budget heavily dominated by "uncontrollable" spending.

It is our responsibility to see that legislation is carefully considered and spending policies are brought under control. For these reasons, I believe it is essential that we move to a 2-year budget cycle as soon as possible.

My legislation provides for a 4-year budget, consisting of two, 2-year budget cycles. Each 2-year cycle will provide a full year for authorization and oversight and a full year for appropriations. The 4-year budget period will provide ample time for long-range planning.

With a 2-year budget cycle, we would see the results of first year decisions by the second year of the cycle and make midcourse corrections as necessary. We would have the time to review the major Federal programs and consider new ones.

We will have twice the time we now have to make the necessary decisions on appropriations and budget.

Dr. Alice Rivlin, Director of the Congressional Budget Office, clearly supported the notion of biennial budgeting in a statement before the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs, October 29, 1981.

In that statement, Dr. Rivlin said:

One alternative to the overcrowded calendar of the annual process would be to move to a biennial budget. I have long believed that authorizations for Federal activities should be for a minimum of two, and preferably for three or more years. In addition, appropriations for most Federal activities could also be placed on a cycle of at least two years' length. Furthermore, there are no technical obstacles to setting spending ceilings and revenue floors for a two-year budget resolution.

One can imagine a dramatically different Congressional calendar under these changes. In the first session of any term, the Congress could adopt a budget resolution, authorizations, and appropriations for two fiscal years. During the Second Session, Congressional committees would be free to conduct oversight of authorizations and supplementals, or revisions to authorizations or budget resolutions as necessary. The next Congress, considering reauthorizations and appropriations during its first session, would then be able to take advantage of the groundwork done by the previous Congress. It would be free, of course, to revise the budget handed to it by the previous Congress.

The budget process today is dangerously close to breakdown. Just 2 months ago, in early December 1981, close to 3 months after the Budget Act deadline, we passed a technical second budget resolution for fiscal year 1982. This was the first time neither House of Congress could agree on a genuine second budget resolution, largely because of delays resulting from consideration of the Reconciliation Act last summer.

If a 2-year budget resolution had been in place this year, we would now be in a position to exercise some oversight over the legislative changes enacted in the reconciliation bill.

Instead, we are now preparing to enact yet another first budget resolution for fiscal year 1983, probably to include further reconciliation instructions. Once again we will have to go through a mass of budget decisions without the benefits of thorough review and informed debate.

I believe we need to review the budget timetables now. We need to move to a 2-year budget process so we can reestablish our capacity to legislate.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill and the attached appendices be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the bill and appendices were ordered printed in the RECORD.

S. 2008

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Budget and Oversight Reform Act of 1981".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds and declares that the present annual Federal budget process—

(1) provides the Congress with insufficient time to effectively perform its legislative and oversight responsibilities;

(2) provides the relevant committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives with insufficient time to review and evaluate the costs and benefits of complex Federal programs;

(3) provides the relevant committees of each House with insufficient time to review the formulas and financing mechanisms utilized in current entitlement programs, and such insufficient time has contributed to unrestrained growth in Federal expenditures; and

(4) provides Federal agencies and State and local authorities insufficient time to plan for changes in Federal programs.

(b) It is the purpose of this Act to establish a more effective and comprehensive budget process by—

(1) establishing a two-year period for adoption and revision of the Federal budget;

(2) establishing a timetable to allow for oversight hearings by the relevant committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives to review the complex programs of the Federal Government;

(3) establishing a timetable for appropriations and final budget spending decisions, which would follow the findings of the review and oversight process; and

(4) strengthening congressional budget procedures by requiring separate and distinct consideration of authorizing legislation, appropriation bills, and the budget, thus allowing time for full evaluation of alternative approaches in the funding of the various programs and agencies of the Federal Government.

(6) if required by subsection (e), the calendar year in which, in the opinion of the Congress, the goals for reducing unemployment set forth in section 4(b) of the Employment Act of 1946 should be achieved; and

(7) such other matters relating to the budget as may be appropriate to carry out the purposes of this Act.

(b) ADDITIONAL MATTERS IN CONCURRENT RESOLUTION.—The first concurrent resolution on the budget may also require—

(1) a procedure under which all or certain bills and resolutions providing new budget authority or providing new spending authority described in section 401(c)(2)(C) for such [fiscal year] biennial fiscal period shall not be enrolled until the concurrent resolution required to be reported under section 310(a) has been agreed to, and, if a reconciliation bill or reconciliation resolution, or both, are required to be reported under section 310(c), until Congress has completed action on that bill or resolution, or both; and

(2) any other procedure which is considered appropriate to carry out the purposes of this Act.

Not later than the close of the Ninety-fifth Congress, the Committee on the Budget of each House shall report to its House on the

Any other committee of the House or Senate may submit to the Committee on the Budget of its House, and any other joint committee of the Congress may submit to the Committees on the Budget of both Houses, its views and estimates with respect to all matters set forth in subsection (a) which relate to matters within its jurisdiction or functions.

Each of the recommendations as to short-term and medium-term goals set forth in the report submitted by the members of the Joint Economic Committee under subsection (c) may be considered by the Committee on the Budget of each House as part of its consideration of such concurrent resolution, and its report may reflect its views thereon, and on how the estimates of revenues and levels of budget authority and outlays set forth in such concurrent resolution are designed to achieve any goals it is recommending. On or before [April 15 of each year] June 30 of each odd-numbered year, the Committee on the Budget of each House shall report to its House the first concurrent resolution on the budget referred to in subsection (a) for the [fiscal year beginning on October 1 of such year] biennial fiscal period beginning on October 1 of the succeeding year. The report accompanying such concurrent resolution shall also include, but not be limited to—

(2) After the Congress has expressed its opinion pursuant to paragraph (1) as to the year in which the goals for reducing unemployment set forth in section 4(b) of the Employment Act of 1946, as amended, can be achieved, if, pursuant to section 4(e) of such Act, the President recommends in the Economic Report that such goals be achieved in a year which is different from the year in which the Congress has expressed its opinion that such goals should be achieved, either in its action pursuant to paragraph (1) or its most recent action pursuant to this paragraph, the first concurrent resolution on the budget for the [fiscal year] biennial fiscal period beginning after the date on which such Economic Reprot is received by the Congress may set forth the year in which, in the opinion of the Congress, such goals can be achieved.

(2) every other committee of the House and Senate to which an allocation was made in such joint explanatory statement shall, after consulting with the committee or committees of the other House to which all or part of its allocation was made, (A) subdivide such allocation among its subcommittees or among programs over which it has jurisdiction, and (B) further subdivide the amount with respect to each subcommittee or program between controllable amounts and all other amounts.

SEC. 303. (a) IN GENERAL.—It shall not be in order in either the House of Representatives or the Senate to consider any bill or resolution (or amendment thereto) which provides—

(b) EXCEPTIONS.—Subsection (a) does not apply to any bill or resolution—

The resolution shall then be referred to the Committee on the Budget of the Senate. That committee shall report the resolution to the Senate within 10 days after the resolution is referred to it (not counting any day on which the Senate is not in session) beginning with the day following the day on which it is so referred, accompanied by that committee's recommendations and reasons for such recommendations with respect to the resolution. If the committee does not report the resolution within such 10-day period, it shall automatically be discharged from further consideration of the resoltuion and the resolution shall be placed on the calendar.

[(6)] (5) Consideration of any concurrent resolution on the budget by the House of Representatives shall be in the Committee of the Whole, and the resolution shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule in accordance with the applicable provisions of rule XXIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives. After the Committee rises and reports the resolution back to the House, the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution and any amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion; except that it shall be in order at any time prior to final passage (notwithstanding any other rule or provision of law) to adopt an amendment (or a series of amendments) changing any figure or figures in the resolution as so reported to the extent necessary to achieve mathematical consistency.

[7] (6) Debate in the House of Representatives on the Conference report or any concurrent resolution on the budget shall be limited to not more than 5 hours, which shall be divided equally between the majority and minority parties. A motion further to limit debate is not debatable. No amendment that is not germane to the provisions of such concurrent resolution shall be received. Such leaders, or either of them, may, from the time under their control on the passage of the concurrent resolution, allot additional time to any Senator during the consideration of any amendment, debatable motion, or appeal.

(3) Following the presentation of opening statements on the first concurrent resolution on the budget for a [fiscal year] biennial fiscal period by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on

A motion to recommit (except a motion to recommit with instructions to report back within a specified number of days, not to exceed 3, not counting any day on which the Senate is not in session) is not in order. Debate on any such motion to recommit shall be limited to 1 hour, to be equally divided between, and controlled by, the mover and the manager of the concurrent resolution.

[(7)] (6) Notwithstanding any other rule, an amendment, or series of amendments, to a concurrent resolution on the budget proposed in the Senate shall always be in order if such amendment or series of amendments proposes to change any figure or figures then contained in such concurrent resolution so as to make such concurrent resolution mathematically consistent or so as to maintain such consistency.

(c) ACTION ON CONFERENCE REPORTS IN THE SENATE.—

(1) The conference report on any concurrent resolution on the budget shall be in order in the Senate at any time after the third day (excluding Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays) following the day on which such a conference report is reported and is available to Members of the Senate. Debate on any amendment to any such instructions shall be limited to 20 minutes, to be equally divided between and controlled by the mover and the manager of the conference report. In all cases when the manager of the conference report is in favor of any motion, appeal, or amendment, the time in opposition shall be under the control of the minority leader or his designee.

(4) In any case in which there are amendments in disagreement, time on each amendment shall be limited to 30 minutes, to be equally divided between, and controlled by, the manager of the conference report and the minority leader or his designee. No amendment that is not germane to the provisions of such amendments shall be received.

(d) REQUIRED ACTION BY CONFERENCE COMMITTEE.—If, at the end of 7 days (excluding Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays) after the conferees of both Houses have been appointed to a committee of conference on a concurrent resolution on the budget, the conferees are unable to reach agreement with respect to all matters in disagreement between the two Houses, then the conferees shall submit to their respective Houses, on the first day thereafter on which their House is in session—

(1) a conference report recommending those matters on which they have agreed and reporting in disagreement those matters on which they have not agreed; or

(2) a conference report in disagreement, if the matter in disagreement is an amendment which strikes out the entire text of the concurrent resolution and inserts a substitute text.

(e) CONCURRENT RESOLUTION MUST BE CONSISTENT IN THE SENATE.—It shall not be in order in the Senate to vote on the question of agreeing to—

(1) a concurrent resolution on the budget unless the figures then contained in such resolution are mathematically consistent; or

(B) shall be reported to the Senate no later than May 1 of the year in which such period begins.

(2) If a committee of the House of Representatives or the Senate determines that changes in circumstances with the passage of time require a waiver of paragraph (1) with respect to any bill or resolution providing supplemental appropriations for any period, such committee may report, and the House or Senate may consider and adopt, a resolution waiving the application of such paragraph in the case of such bill or resolution.

By Mr. KASTEN:

S. 2009. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code to eliminate special rules for leasing; to the Committee on Finance.

ELIMINATION OF CERTAIN LEASING PROVISIONS

● Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to repeal the leasing provisions of the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981.

As we start the second year of what is destined to be an historic Congress, this Nation is faced with ballooning Federal deficits which are holding interest rates high and impeding economic recovery. We are justifiably concerned about the size of these deficits and the seeming inability of this Congress to control them. Many among us have urged tax increases to help reduce these projected deficits. Some have suggested excise taxes. Others would roll back the individual income tax cuts now scheduled for July of 1982 and 1983. Still others have suggested that indexing of tax rates in 1985 be repealed, thereby opening the taxpayers once again to the ravages of the progressive income tax and inflation. Because of lack of commitment, this Congress could effectively undo what has taken so many years to accomplish.

Or we could look first to eliminating tax loopholes through which a few benefit at the expense of many, indeed at the expense of a stable economy in which fairness and equity are a reality. Many of us have already advocated removing tax loopholes, and certainly most of our constitutents support that goal.

The worst of these loopholes is the leasing provision which somehow made its way into the code last summer.

Congress needs to act responsibly to repeal this provision. It is allowing profitable companies to purchase tax losses at a fraction of their worth, charge off those losses to the Federal Treasury at the full value, and then use those same dollars not to invest in new plant or equipment, but more often to look for tax shelters by buying up other firms, firms which might be more productive under their own management.

I believe that taxes in this country are too high, and that this is the wrong time to increase them. I strongly supported President Reagan's tax package, and I voted for the entire bill. I do not believe unfair advantages should accrue to certain segments of the business community. The leasing provisions are an unfair advantage, and were not part of the President's original tax package. They were one of those last minute sweeteners. But they have turned sour, and they need to be eliminated or drastically modified.

The struggling businesses these provisions were to help are still struggling. And the profitable businesses who bought the tax losses are more profitable—more profitable at the expense of the Treasury and the taxpayers.

Let me cite just one example: In the November 11, 1981, issue of the Washington Post it was reported that Occidental Petroleum, one of the Fortune 500's most profitable growth companies, was selling $94.8 million in tax breaks to Marsh and McLennan for an estimated $20 to $30 million. Note that Congress never intended this type of firm to benefit, especially not at a time when high interest rates and growing unemployment levels are causing serious hardship to untold millions.

Occidental, in this example, gets $20 to $30 million, despite high profits, and Marsh and McLennan picks up a nice little tax benefit of from $60 to $70 million for doing nothing. Incidentally, Occidental paid no U.S. Federal taxes in 1978, 1979, or 1980.

It appears, Mr. President, that in the confusion of passing the tax bill, in the bidding war that occurred, and in the compromises which evolved, the leasing provisions did not receive the kind of close study they should have had. In short, the leasing provisions were a mistake. Congress can correct this mistake and at the same time help increase revenues and reduce the deficit.

The Treasury Department estimates the revenue loss through this loophole could amount to as much as $5.4 billion in 1984, and up to $29 billion by 1986.

Mr. President, before Congress even considers adding taxes on working Americans either by imposing new regressive excise taxes, by rolling back the income tax cuts, or by repealing the indexing provisions, it simply must attack the worst of the tax loopholes. And leasing is one of the worst. It does not promote investment, savings, or new technology in a free marketplace. In fact, it may have the opposite effect by subsidizing poor management and bad corporate decisions. Surely, if it is to be national policy to subsidize inefficiency, and I think it should not be, Congress can work out a better scheme than transferring huge payments from one corporation to another.

These leasing provisions have been referred to as food stamps for corporations. There is a lot of truth in that. Slick tax advisers are making fortunes by arranging tax transfers which benefit very few. A tax system based on such a policy can not long retain the faith and confidence of a majority.

Fortunately, in our country, Congress has the power to correct mistakes. Repeal is needed immediately. Repeal should be swift and certain. Repeal of this most onerous provision will demonstrate Congress resolve to legislate with firmness, fairness, and with equity. Repeal will signal to those who would use this loophole for their own narrow purposes that Congress expects sound, efficient business practices that will result in productive enterprises competing in a free market. Repeal will emphasize that the Federal Treasury is not up for grabs to a few promoters who would manipulate the Tax Code to the detriment of the Nation's economic well being.

I ask that a copy of my bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2010. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to eliminate the special leasing provisions of the accelerated cost recovery system; to the Committee on Finance.

ELIMINATION OF CERTAIN LEASING PROVISIONS

● Mr. BOREN. Mr. President, I have been back home in Oklahoma for the last 6 weeks talking to constituents. I have found worried people who are primarily concerned about the state of the economy and its impact on their future and the future of the Nation.

At the beginning of this administration, Oklahomans of both political parties sought to give this administration a chance to succeed. I personally shared the conviction of my constituents that the problems facing this country are too important to play partisan political games. It was hoped that any revenue loss resulting from the tax cuts proposed by the administration and enacted by Congress would be more than offset by further expenditure reductions and economic growth. But to date, largely because of high interest rates brought on by increasing deficits and the failure of the administration to halt the use of credit for nonproductive and unhealthy corporate mergers, this has not happened.

In the intervening year, while most Oklahomans still express great personal warmth toward the President, many people express uneasiness about policies pursued by this administration and frustration at the effects of those policies. I think most Oklahomans as well as most Americans, believe that deficits do not matter and that the Congress and the administration should take immediate steps to reduce the deficit and balance the budget in the near term.

The most obvious place to begin is with the repeal of the safe harbor leasing provisions enacted in the Economic Recovery Tax Act. The leasing provisions are perhaps the most glaring example of wasteful loss of Federal tax dollars. It has been estimated that the annual revenue loss resulting from the leasing provisions will reach as high as $80 billion by 1990.

The beneficiaries of this expensive loophole are not the individual taxpayers who may have just lost their jobs or who cannot afford to buy a house or farmers who can not borrow money for planting next year's crop. The beneficiaries are well-to-do corporate taxpayers, who in some cases pay no taxes at all. This result has not been lost on the public. Most citizens with whom I have visited display deeply felt resentment for such a law, passed by Congress and signed by the President, which allows large corporations to buy and sell tax credits. These voters are especially alarmed about the additional taxes which are being talked about in some circles to make up for the revenue which is being lost through this unjust tax loophole.

The example of Occidential Petroleum is one of the most shocking. Here is the case of a booming corporation which owed no taxes because it already received many tax breaks such as credits for overseas operations. The corporation then turned around and sold $200 million of unused tax credits to another profitable American company, thereby enabling the other company to also greatly reduce its taxes.

It is indefensible to talk about putting additional taxes like those which have been talked about on gasoline and telephone service to be paid by the average American worker while allowing this glaring tax shelter to continue. I would have to part company with this administration on the issue of new taxes if they attempt to introduce them without repeal of leasing.

I believe that the vast majority of our citizens are willing to make sacrifices to balance the budget if they are convinced that all citizens are sharing fairly in the effort. The existence of this unjustifiable tax loophole does not meet that test of fairness.

Last week I sent a letter to the President urging him to include repeal of leasing in the state of the Union tomorrow night. Although I have not received a response, I am still hopeful that he will support such repeal. I include a copy of my letter and ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., January 21, 1982.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Last summer, I was pleased to join with you in seeking enactment of the Economic Recovery Tax Act. In doing so it was my hope that the revenue loss resulting from these tax cuts would be more than offset by further expenditure reduction and economic growth. To date, such events have not occurred.

In light of our worsening economic situation, I think we should re-evaluate priorities. I am firmly committed to reducing the federal deficit immediately and balancing the budget in the near term. I believe such action is fundamental to controlling inflation and bringing interest rates back down. I am convinced that both the Congress and the Administration should take immediate steps to achieve those goals.

One such step would be to repeal the so-called safe harbor leasing provisions which were included in last year's tax legislation. The leasing provisions, sometimes called "rent-a-deduction," are perhaps the most glaring example of wasteful loss of federal tax dollars. It has been estimated that the annual revenue loss resulting from the leasing provisions will reach as high as $80 billion by 1990.

The beneficiaries of this expensive loophole are not the individual taxpayers who may have just lost their jobs or who cannot afford to buy a house or farmers who cannot borrow money for planting next year's crop. The beneficiaries are well-to-do corporate taxpayers, who in some cases pay no taxes at all.

The impact of the leasing provisions is not lost upon the American public. Most citizens with whom I have visited display deeply-felt resentment for a law, passed by the Congress and signed by the President, which allows large corporations to buy and sell tax credits. These voters are especially alarmed about the additional taxes which are being talked about in some circles to make up for the revenue which is being lost through this unjust tax loophole.

No new taxes should be imposed on the average American until we have closed this glaring tax loophole. I strongly urge you to ask for repeal of this provision before proposing any new tax increases, and respectfully request that you consider including the proposal in your State of the Union address.

How can we possibly even consider imposing additional taxes which many working Americans and senior citizens cannot afford to pay, like those suggested by some on gasoline and telephone service, while this extravagant subsidy for large corporations remains on the books? Such loopholes also make it harder to balance the budget. Most Americans, including myself, believe that we must move to balance the budget and act to bring down continuing high interest rates.

I believe that the vast majority of our citizens are willing to make sacrifices to balance the budget if they are convinced that all citizens are sharing fairly in the effort. The existence of unjustifiable tax loopholes does not meet that test of fairness.

Sincerely yours,

DAVID L. BOREN,
U.S. Senator.●

By Mr. BAUCUS:

S. 2011. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to eliminate the special leasing rules provided under the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981; to the Committee on Finance.

ELIMINATION OF CERTAIN LEASING PROVISIONS

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation to repeal the special leasing rules of the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981. Those rules effectively permit the sale of certain business tax breaks. They work by giving such sales the tax treatment given to real leases. My legislation would discontinue that special treatment for agreements reached after its enactment.

I intend to cosponsor similar bills that have been introduced and that may be introduced. It does not matter which bill is used as a vehicle to debate the leasing provisions. What does matter is that we do seriously consider the merits of leasing.

The leasing provision has received much more scrutiny after passage than it did before. Recognizing mounting skepticism, the administration recently made a strong effort to defend it. Part of their argument is that the fictitious leases are needed to deal with competitive distortions created by other exceedingly generous parts of the Tax Act.

I do not agree that the leasing provision is needed. But the administration is correct in linking it closely to the accelerated cost recovery system of the Tax Act and to investment tax credits. The issue is somewhat complicated—not just because the leasing provision is difficult to understand, but because some of the problems with leasing point up problems with the other provisions.

The special leasing rules "safe harbor" certain fictitious leasing agreements. That is, they protect them from previous IRS tests and related judicial decisions. This permits a firm with little or no tax liability to finance its purchase of property by calling the financing arrangement a lease.

The resulting sale transfers two tax breaks to the paper lessor: The first is an investment tax credit, which represents a direct subsidy from other taxpayers. The second is rapid tax depreciation, which creates an interest-free loan from the Treasury.

Although I have openly questioned the wisdom of the leasing provision. I wanted to give it fair treatment before proposing action. Among other things, I have written experts, asking them questions about safe harbor leasing and related incentives for business investment.

The responses note the effect of the incentives in raising interest rates and in otherwise hurting the housing industry. There is significant skepticism over the incentives as viable tools for U.S. reindustrialization. It was suggested that more support for research and development would be better.

Although there was no unanimity on many points, the responses have helped me reach two conclusions: First, the special leasing rules should be repealed; and second, we need to look longer and harder at the cost-effectiveness of ACRS, investment tax credits, and other current tax provisions which purport to build U.S. industry.

Mr. President, last year Congress enacted a tax program that is unprecedented in American history.

The revenue loss is enormous.

The resulting Federal deficit will be staggering.

The deep economic implications were not fully understood.

How will we make up the revenue loss? Will we cut social programs further—when more people are out of work? Will we cut defense spending? Or will we accept the largest deficits in American history? Will we abandon hope for a balanced budget?

Last year we also applied rigid budgetary analysis to domestic programs. To be fair—and to employ sound budget procedures—we must apply equally tough standards to other programs.

We must eliminate waste, and fraud, and abuse wherever we find it. This includes the Tax Code. It includes the defense budget.

Today I address tax leasing. While it may have looked like good politics, it represents questionable economics, at best.

Does it cost too much?

What are we getting for our money?

Is it fair? Is it sound? Is it justified?

I believe that the answers to these questions—applied to the leasing provision—are not reassuring.

Mr. President, tax leasing is expensive. It may cost the Treasury some $30 billion through 1986. Remember—we are facing gigantic projected deficits. We are facing strangling interest rates. We are ripping holes through the safety net. The lumber and housing industries in my part of the country—and nationwide—are being decimated.

Tax leasing is not cost effective. What are we buying for the money we spend? Can we really predict with any certainty that businesses will be motivated as planned? Will they buy depreciable equipment that would not otherwise be purchased?

Tax leasing is not well targeted. In fact, much of it is not targeted at all. There is no guarantee that the kind of equipment—and other depreciable property—acquired by the leases will effectively improve American competitiveness, and productivity.

For example, tax leasing provides benefits to profitable corporations which have no tax liability to begin with. It also provides benefits to profitable corporations which buy the tax benefit.

Did Congress really want Occidental Petroleum to profit by selling a tax break, or Standard Oil of Indiana to profit by buying one?

Tax leasing is not efficient. If we wanted to give money to a firm which has no tax liability, it would be less costly to simply write them a check.

Tax leasing discriminates against small business. Small businesses without tax liability cannot use leasing as well as their larger competitors. It is harder for them to sell tax breaks. Most small businesses are also prohibited from buying them.

Partnerships, other unincorporated businesses, and closely held corporations are excluded as buyers.

I question the argument that safe harbor leasing prevents takeovers based on tax considerations.

Takeover decisions are more likely based upon the price of stock relative to overall assets—and relative to estimates about the targets' future. In fact, considering the short-term perspective of American management, tax leasing may divert corporate attention from more risky, longer term ventures with greater productivity possibilities.

My bill would grandfather in leases already consummated. This is necessary to preserve the credibility of the Tax Code. We should not penalize firms which have already entered into leasing agreements, based on current law.

Mr. President, tax leasing is, in reality, a gimmick. It provides an artificial means of transferring the benefits of artificial depreciation—and artificial revenue.

It fails all truth in packaging tests. It uses the label of an accepted business transaction—leasing—for a product that is really a subsidy to business.

There is an argument for Government help for certain businesses.

However, let us do it in the open. Let us do it more efficiently.

Furthermore, we have to face serious long-term questions.

Our Nation faces a skilled labor shortage. We need scientists, engineers, technicians.

Our Nation needs investments in productivity-generating activities. We must increase process productivity—to make today's goods more efficiently. We must increase productivity in the new industries of the future—computers, electronics, communications. We need increased research and development as well as new plant equipment and machinery.

The evidence so far is that the 1981 act has failed to generate the predicted investments.

Mr. President, we face a changing world economy. We face economic decay at home, and challenge from abroad. We find old industries that must be revitalized—and new industries being born.

How should we best spend the taxpayers money? How can we get American business moving again? Is the 1981 act sufficient? Will it work? Is it fair?

Tax leasing is a symptom of a broader, deeper problem. An article in the current issue of Forbes Magazine, dated February 1, 1982, points up one of the equity problems with the leasing provision. In the coming months, I intend to address in more detail the issues I have sketched today. I ask unanimous consent that the bill and the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A MODEST PROPOSAL

(By Richard Greene)

Thanks to the leasing provisions of the Reagan tax proposals, corporations are now buying and selling tax credits from one another as if they were so many carloads of solvent. The practice effectively subverts many of the provisions so painstakingly drafted in the original tax code. So widespread has it become that Congress is dismayed.

If individuals were permitted to behave like corporations, you might encounter curiosities like the following. Here, with apologies to Jonathan Swift, we offer a modest proposal.

First, with all respect to the needs for perpetuation of the race, let us accept the fact that there are those individuals who have great numbers of children and little income with which to support them. Such parents must frequently accept public assistance to provide for these children, who may number six, eight or even a dozen. There is often little food in such homes, and the children are left to their own devices for playthings.

These families, if you will, are the Chryslers of the personal tax system. They have a plenitude of children, as Chrysler has capital investment tax credits, but they have no income to shelter with these deductions. This is an unfortunate waste of potentially valuable tax benefits: $1,000 a year from the federal government and more from the states; as much as $1,500 in Mississippi and Michigan.

Now, let us consider wealthy families in the 50 percent tax bracket with few children. These families have a great deal of income to shelter but lack the personal tax deductions to do the job.

Would it not therefore seem to follow that these individuals should be encouraged to adopt the poor children and take the tax deductions? Were the wealthy family to adopt a dozen children in the state of Michigan, say, it would receive a $30,000 tax deduction. In the 50 percent tax bracket, that represents $15,000 in real money.

But, you protest, what is to become of the children, living in unloving if well-off surroundings? Once again, let us follow the pattern of the corporations: The children never have to leave their original homes. After they are adopted, their original parents establish a "boarding school for children," which is in fact their own home populated by their own children. They receive, let us say, $7,500 for the task (which is, of course, deductible for the wealthy family). They are now better able to afford to care for their children, the children remain where they are, and the wealthy adopting parents have $7,500 in their pockets, not to mention the uplifting realization that they have done something fine and noble for mankind.

S. 2012. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to limit the deduction of living expenses by Members of Congress and to eliminate the provision which allows such deduction without substantiation of such expenses; to the Committee on Finance.

DEDUCTION OF LIVING EXPENSES BY MEMBERS OF CONGRESS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, today, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Maine (Mr. MITCHELL), and the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. PRESSLER), I am introducing a bill which would repeal the special expense account provisions Congress voted itself last October and December.

I am doing this in part because it is so obviously unfair that at a time when ordinary citizens are paying heavy taxes while suffering recessions Members of the House and Senate will get a big tax break denied to almost all other taxpayers.

HISTORY OF THE NEW PROVISIONS

Late last year the Congress passed legislation which together with an interpretation by the Secretary of the Treasury gives Members a nice fat $18,000 deduction in computing our income taxes, for expenses—for what? For being away from home in Washington. What is wrong with that? Here is what is wrong: Members of Congress make their home in Washington. We have our wives, our children, with us here in Washington. When people elect us they do not expect us to go to some other city in our State. They expect us to go to Washington. We do. But now the Congress wants the IRS to pretend that we really reside back in our State and only leave that home back in the State to do business here in Washington. Is that true? No way. The Secretary of the Treasury at the request of the Congress has determined that last year there were 240 congressional days. That is two-thirds of the year and we will be entitled to a fat $75 deduction or $75-a-day for every one of those days last year, as if we were away from home. So, No. 1, if our wives and children live with us here, and we spend officially two-thirds of our time here—at least we get a $75 deduction for spending 240 days a year here. How can anyone say we do not live in Washington? Now for the icing on the cake. During those congressional days when we receive our $75-a-day deduction we can and will actually spend 2 or 3 or 4 days each week out in our State, physically out there. But we will get that $75-a-day deduction as if we were spending our time in Washington, though in fact we are not in Washington at all. And while we are in our State, the Government will pick up the tab on all, and I mean all our expenses in the State: It will pay for our meals. It will pay for our motels or hotels. It will pay travel within the State.

Now take a minute to consider this position. We actually will on a given day—say next Saturday—have the Federal Government pick up my tab for a motel in Milwaukee, Wis. It will pay for three meals in Kenosha, Wis., Racine, Wis., and Beloit, Wis. I will spend every minute of that 24 hours away from Washington—out in my State, but I will have $75 deducted from my income in computing my income tax for Washington expenses which I do not incur, because I am not here. You ask, but will not the IRS simply disallow those deductions on the ground that you did not incur them? Answer: "No." Why not? Because the Congress has passed a law—now in effect—that says its Members can deduct $75 a day for every congressional day. The Secretary of the Treasury has made a finding that last year there were 240 congressional days—although Congress was only in session for 165 days. And the IRS cannot, under the law the Congress passed, challenge or audit or require corroboration for any deduction up to the $75 a day that Members of Congress claim on their taxes.

We do all this at a time when we have provided a tax cut for all persons in the country of 25 percent—a tax cut that will especially benefit Members of Congress because we enjoy an income of $60,000, more than 3 times as high as the typical American family. We do this when the IRS has announced they will double the audits of other taxpayers in our tax brackets. But the $18,000 annual deduction from income for Members of Congress will not be subject to an audit. The law provides that the IRS in the case of Members of the Congress alone cannot go behind the deduction and demand substantiation.

This kind of legislation which Congress voted for itself is exactly what tends to bring us into disrepute. I might say it passed by a very narrow margin, by only two votes, and I think it was not—there was no vote at all in the House of Representatives. It was attached to the black lung bill, and most Members did not even know it was attached to it, and they protested vigorously in many cases about that deduction.

I believe it should be repealed, not only to right what I believe is an obvious wrong but to restore credibility to the Congress itself.

Mr. President, I send a bill to the desk and ask that it be appropriately referred and that it be printed in the RECORD, and I want to serve notice that I expect to call this up, if necessary, as an amendment to other legislation as I get an opportunity to do so.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from Wisconsin would add me as a cosponsor?

Mr. PROXMIRE. I am delighted. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Missouri (Mr. DANFORTH) be added as a cosponsor to the repealer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2013. A bill to amend the Controlled Substances Act to establish a temporary program under which heroin would be made available through qualified hospital pharmacies for the relief of pain of cancer patients; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

TEMPORARY PROGRAM ON AVAILABILITY OF HEROIN FOR CANCER PATIENTS

● Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation, along with Senators ABDNOR, DECONCINI, HATFIELD, HOLLINGS, LEAHY, LEVIN, MATSUNAGA, PELL, RANDOLPH, RIEGLE, STAFFORD, SYMMS, TSONGAS, WEICKER, AND WILLIAMS, which is directed to relieving the suffering of a small but significant number of our citizens: patients who are terminally ill with cancer and whose pain has not been effectively mitigated with currently available medications.

For many years, the thought of cancer and its accompanying pain have sent chills of fear through all of us; likewise, the thought of heroin and its addictive qualities produces similar fears. Now, however, in my judgment we are in a position where we can make a logical and thoughtful decision to legalize the therapeutic use of heroin for the terminally ill cancer patient suffering intractable pain while at the same time safeguarding against the diversion of the drug into illicit channels.

The legislation I introduce today is supported by thousands of Americans and is cosponsored by 15 of my colleagues. Furthermore, I am pleased to report that to a great extent, it reflects the current evolution and thinking of our Nation's health care system as evidenced by the editorial in the January 14, 1982, issue of the prestigious New England Journal of Medicine which urged more flexibility in the use of addictive drugs in the treatment of pain. This thinking is also present in an official statement made by the American Psychiatric Association which endorses the "principle that the effectiveness of relief of pain in terminal cancer patients should take priority over a concern about 'addiction' of the terminal cancer patient and should take priority over a concern about medication diversion to addicts."

The need for this legislation is dramatic. Although over the past two decades a great deal of progress has been made in treating cancer, this year an estimated 815,000 Americans will be diagnosed as having cancer, and over 400,000 will die from this disease. Most of these individuals will have received competent and compassionate medical care, and adequate relief of pain. Unfortunately, the reality is also that a certain number of cancer patients do not obtain relief of pain from the currently available analgesic medication—even the strongest narcotics. It has been estimated that about 20 percent of terminal cancer patients suffer significant pain. Of this 20 percent, it has been estimated that 10 percent do not obtain relief with presently prescribed medications. In human terms, these percentages mean that as many as 8,000 Americans may die in agony this year because of the intractable pain associated with terminal cancer. I have been assured by my medical colleagues that in many cases this pain can be alleviated with the therapeutic use of heroin, making the last months, weeks or days of these patients more bearable. These dying patients are not now given the option of dying with dignity because of our Nation's continued and overriding fear of the term "heroin." In my judgment, this fear alone has prevented us, the lawmakers of our Nation, from making clear and rational decisions regarding the limited use of this long-proven and already available substance.

Heroin has been proven effective with a number of patients in relieving pain. Research recently completed at Georgetown University's Vincent T. Lombardi Cancer Research Center has found heroin to be an effective analgesic for the control of cancer-related pain. In particular, it has been reported to be more potent than morphine in relieving cancer pain. Less than half of the dose of heroin produces the same pain relief as a dose of morphine. In the terminal phase of cancer, many patients cannot take medication by mouth, and may require injections. As the disease progresses, individuals may require higher doses at more frequent intervals, to provide relief. This is when it would be desirable to have the option of using heroin in treating pain, since heroin is more potent and more soluable than morphine salts, and an effective dose can be administered in considerably smaller volumes. Thus, doctors have informed me that it is less painful to have such an injection—an important consideration in the emaciated patient with little tissue mass remaining. Further, the onset of action of the heroin is also more rapid than morphine because of its soluability, giving relief of pain and a sense of well-being sooner. It is most unfortunate that the use of heroin for these patients has not been allowed up to this date. This legislation will enable physicians to treat the dying cancer patient who suffers from intractable pain with a proven, effective medication.

The time has now come to address the issue of why the heroin should not be readily available as a therapeutic medication for our Nation's physicians in very specific situations and under very careful supervision when we have dying cancer patients who are suffering extreme pain. William Buckley has described our irrational maintenance of the prohibition against such uses of heroin in very real terms. As he pointed out:

> The irony is that anybody in a major city can acquire the knowledge necessary to buy heroin from a dirty little drug pimp, but licensed doctors may not administer the identical drug to men and women—and children—literally dying from excruciating pain.

I am most pleased to report that our colleagues on the House Subcommittee on Health and the Environment held hearings on a similar bill on September 4, 1980. At that time, a number of practicing physicians and others asked that the Federal controls on heroin be eased to permit the prescription of heroin for patients for whom more conventional pain killers were inadequate. It was further pointed out that in Great Britain, heroin has been used for many years for these patients and that it has been shown to be particularly effective for those 10 percent of terminal cancer patients who require injected medication. British physicians consider heroin to be an indispensable potent narcotic analgesic in the treatment of advanced cancer. Use of heroin in specific situations is also permitted in Belgium, New Zealand, China and many other civilized nations.

The bill I am introducing today will give a very high priority to relief from intractable pain for terminal cancer patients. It authorizes the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services to establish demonstration programs which will permit the use of heroin by terminally ill cancer patients only, when suffering from pain which is not effectively treated with currently available analgesic medications.

My bill has more than adequate safeguards to prevent the drug from being introduced to the general public. For example, a diagnosis must first be made by the attending physician that his or her patient is ill with cancer and is suffering from pain which is not being effectively treated with other available analgesic medications. This diagnosis must be reviewed and approved by a medical review board of the hospital which will dispense the heroin. The heroin used in the program will be from that supply now confiscated under current laws. The Secretary of Health and Human Services is further authorized to establish additional regulations for the safe use and storage of the heroin, to prevent its diversion into illicit channels. This program will be in force for a 5-year period and periodic reporting is required of the Secretary on the activities under the bill.

I strongly believe that this proposal will provide substantial benefits to those who are in intractable pain from terminal cancer and I am hopeful that my colleagues on the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee will give this measure their prompt and most serious consideration.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my bill and the attached articles be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill and articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2013

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the Congress finds and declares that—

(1) a significant number of terminally ill cancer patients suffer from pain which is not effectively treated by currently available analgesic medications;

(2) heroin has proven efficacy as a patient pain-killing drug; and

(3) it is appropriate to establish a temporary program to provide, through qualified hospital pharmacies, heroin for relief of pain of cancer patients.

(b) The Controlled Substances Act is amended by adding at the end the following new part:

"PART H—TEMPORARY HEROIN PROGRAM

"SEC. 801. (a) Effective October 1, 1982, the Secretary of Health and Human Services (hereinafter in this section referred to as the 'Secretary') shall establish a program under which heroin confiscated in the enforcement of this title and title III shall be made available to the pharmacies of qualified hospitals for dispensing to individuals with cancer for the relief of pain.

"(b) Heroin may be made available under the program established under subsection (a) only upon application of a qualified hospital. The application shall—

"(1) be in such form and submitted in such manner as the Secretary may prescribe; and

"(2) contain assurances satisfactory to the Secretary that—

"(A) the applicant meets such special requirements as the Secretary may prescribe respecting the storage and dispensing of the heroin; and

"(B) heroin provided under the application—

"(i) will be dispensed through the pharmacy of the applicant upon the written order of a physician registered under section 302 to dispense controlled substances in schedule II; and

"(ii) will be dispensed only for the relief of pain to individuals with cancer who are diagnosed in accordance with subsection (c).

Requirements prescribed by the Secretary under paragraph (2)(A) shall be designed to protect against the diversion into illicit channels of heroin distributed under the program without placing undue restrictions on the abilities of hospitals to participate in the program.

"(c) A diagnosis that an individual is ill with cancer and is suffering from pain not effectively treated with currently available analgesic medications shall be made before heroin is dispensed for the individual and shall be made as follows:

"(1) The diagnosis shall be initially made by the attending physician of such individual.

"(2) The diagnosis of the attending physician must be reviewed and approved by the medical review board of the hospital which will dispense the heroin.

"(d) If the Secretary determines that the amount of heroin confiscated in the enforcement of this title and title III is not sufficient to meet the applications of qualified hospitals, the Secretary may, notwithstanding section 1002(a) of the Controlled Substances Import and Export Act, import opium for the purpose of manufacturing additional heroin to be distributed under the program.

"(e) This title, title III, and the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act shall not apply with respect to—

"(1) the importing of opium,

"(2) the manufacture of heroin, and

"(3) the distribution and dispensing of heroin, in accordance with this section and the program established under this section.

"(f) Not later than three months after the date of the enactment of this section, and every three months thereafter until the program required by subsection (a) is established, the Secretary shall report to the Committee on Energy and Commerce of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Labor and Human Resources of the Senate on the activities undertaken to establish and implement such program. One year after such program is established and annually thereafter while such program is in effect, the Secretary shall report to such committees on the activities under such program during the period for which the report is submitted.

"(g) For purposes of the program established under subsection (a), a qualified hospital is a hospital which is registered under section 302 to dispense a controlled substance in schedule II.

"(h) The program established under subsection (a) shall terminate sixty months after the date on which the program is established.".

SEC. 2. (a) Paragraph (b) of schedule I in section 202(c) of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 812) is amended by striking out clause (10) and redesignating clauses (11) through (22) as clauses (10) through (21), respectively.

(b) Paragraph (b) of schedule II in such section is amended by adding at the end the following:

"(22) Heroin.".

SEC. 3. The Director of the National Cancer Institute shall take such action as may be necessary to secure an exemption from section 505 of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act for heroin to be used in an investigation sponsored by the Institute of the safety and effectiveness of heroin for the treatment of pain.

NATIONAL CANCER INSTITUTE STUDY REPORTED BY SCIENCE MAGAZINE—HEROIN "CONSIDERABLY MORE EFFECTIVE"

HEROIN AND CANCER PAIN

Heroin hasn't been used to relieve pain in U.S. cancer patients since 1924 because of fear that patients would become addicted to it. However, the favorable experience of the British in using heroin to relieve cancer pain prompted William T. Beaver and Philip S. Schein of Georgetown University's cancer research center to conduct a scientific trial to see exactly how heroin stacks up against morphine in easing cancer pain. (Because morphine is a less potent narcotic than heroin, it is available to U.S. cancer patients.)

Forty-eight cancer patients with moderate to severe pain received single injections of morphine and single injections of heroin. Neither the nurse-observer nor the patients knew which drug was being given at any particular time. The patients then rated each drug for pain relief. They rated heroin to be two and a half times more potent than morphine, Beaver and Schein reported in New Orleans at the recent annual meeting of the American Society for Clinical Pharmacology, and Therapeutics. What's more, none of the patients experienced euphoria after getting heroin or morphine. Thus, heroin appears to be no more addictive to cancer patients than is morphine and considerably more effective in relieving pain.

(Note: Results of this Georgetown study were also presented at the 17th Annual Meeting of the American Society of Clinical Oncologists in Washington, D.C., on May 1, 1981, and published in Clinical Pharmacology and Therapeutics, February 1981.)

A CRUSADE AGAINST PAIN

(By William F. Buckley, Jr.)

Might we defer for just a moment consideration of the proposal that Congressman John Anderson be given his own navy with which to fight Iran—and bring up an unrelated subject? The purpose of these paragraphs is to celebrate the lonely work of Mrs. Judith Quatilebaum. She is engaged in the grisly work of contemplating the terrible pain that accompanies some deaths by cancer, and attempting to bring a little relief from that pain to the hopeless.

To that end she launched a few years ago the National Committee on the Treatment of Intractable Pain (address: Box 34571, Washington, 20034). The committee has one simple objective: to permit the use of heroin for patients dying of terminal cancer and facing pain so acute as to defy the administrations of morphine, which is the staple pain-killer.

Now for understandable reasons, the federal government is reluctant to authorize any use of heroin—on the grounds that some of it might get out on the streets. The irony is that anybody in a major city can acquire the knowledge necessary to buy heroin from a dirty little drug pimp, but licensed doctors may not administer the identical drug to men and women—and children—literally dying from excruciating pain.

So what does the government do about the call of Mrs. Quatilebaum's distinguished committee to sponsor a revision of the law? You guessed it. The question is turned over to a research team, to make recommendations. Anyone studying the rococo title of that brigade would guess that it would never get around to doing anything about it.

The question is in the hands of: Dr. Seymour Perry, Associate Director for Medical Applications of Research, Chairman of the Interagency Committee on New Therapies for Pain and Discomfort, National Institute of Health, Bethesda, Md. Oh yes, Zip Code 20014.

The Perry group is supposed to research the question whether we mightn't find a synthetic drug that has the same impact as heroin, but not its addictive danger. Bully. But if one applied the same rules governing the Perry group to the energy crisis, we would suspend the use of all existing automobiles until we developed one that would take us 100 miles per gallon. There are tens of thousands of human beings dying of insufferable pain every year while the Perry team moans about looking for substitutes.

Moreover, the Perry group appears to be uninterested in pursuing with Mrs. Quatilebaum's committee the question of the usefulness of heroin. Dr. Perry approvingly quoted an English researcher writing for the 1977 issue of Pain to the effect that oral doses of heroin didn't produce satisfactory results.

When Mrs. Q. replied that the very same report, in its conclusions, revalidated the usefulness of heroin, Dr. Perry declined to reply. Dr. Twycross, an English expert on the subject (in England, with one statement in 1955, Winston Churchill demolished the prohibitionists' attempt to ape American laws; 38 countries authorize heroin for the terminally sick) concluded, "when injections are necessary, diamorphine (heroin) is undoubtedly the best and safest of all the potent narcotic analgesics and is indispensable in the care of a proportion of patients with advanced cancer."

Why hasn't Congress done something about it? Mrs. Q. and her committee, on which there are distinguished representatives including doctors, theologians and psychoanalysts, saved Congress the trouble of drafting the necessary legislation. They retained Kenneth Lazarus, a Washington lawyer and former counsel to President Ford, to write model legislation.

It is appalling to report that no congressman seems to have got around to introducing the necessary bill. One hates to put it that way, but people dying of agony in the hospital don't as a rule get out of bed to vote, and that may have something to do with that awful indifference to other people's pain that is a birthmark of most human beings.

But not of Judith Quatilebaum, whose name, though difficult to spell, will stay in the memory of those who in the future will be eased out of their misery by the drug she seeks so doggedly to make available, guided by the biblical injunction: For I was hungry, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me in.

APA TRUSTEES ENDORSE ASSEMBLY STATEMENT SUPPORTING CANCER PAIN RELIEF

The American Psychiatric Association Board of Trustees, at its December 1980 meeting, has officially endorsed the following statement, unanimously approved by its APA Assembly on October 26, 1980, as follows:

Endorse the principle that the effectiveness of relief of pain in terminal cancer patients should take priority over a concern about "addiction" of the terminal cancer patient and should take priority over a concern about medication diversion to addicts.

The Assembly Action Paper, introducing the above, states:

1. Subject: Use of Addictive Medications in the Terminally Ill.

2. Problem: Recently Congress has been considering legislation that would allow the use of heroin with the terminally ill cancer patient (H.R. 7334, "Madigan" Bill). It is estimated that 40 to 50 percent of the terminal cancer patients experience severe, constant pain, and for a portion of those patients intravenous heroin is reported to be the most effective available analgesic, with no adverse medical effect especially when employed near term.

Psychiatry has a general interest in this issue because of our focus on the whole patient and because of the interrelations of anxiety and depression in the management of pain. Psychiatry is specifically drawn into this issue because opponents of the use of addictive medications in the terminal cancer patient have made arguments about addicting the terminal cancer patient and have made arguments about diversion of addictive medications from legitimate uses to uses by addicts. These arguments should be answered to the effect that medication tolerance—even if it should develop in the terminal cancer patient—does not adversely effect the patient's medical condition and does not constitute "addiction." Secondly, while we share concerns about illegal diversions, such concerns should be separately and effectively addressed and not take precedence over meaningful relief of the suffering from terminal cancer.

GREATER USE OF PAIN-KILLERS IS URGED BY MEDICAL JOURNAL

BOSTON.—Hospitalized patients endure too much day-to-day pain because doctors and nurses are needlessly stingy with narcotics, an editorial in the prestigious New England Journal of Medicine said today.

Hospital staffers should get rid of their unrealistic fear that patients will become addicted or suffer harmful side effects from pain-killers and increase doses if necessary, wrote Dr. Marcia Angell, deputy editor of the medical journal.

"Few things a doctor does are more important than relieving pain," she wrote. "Yet the treatment of severe pain in hospitalized patients is regularly and systematically inadequate.

"Pain is soul-destroying. No patient should have to endure intense pain unnecessarily. The quality of mercy is essential to the practice of medicine; here, of all places, it should not be strained."

Angell said one study showed that 73 percent of patients undergoing treatment for pain continued to experience moderate-to-severe discomfort despite medication.

"The desire to protect patients from becoming insidiously drawn into a state of addiction distorts both our sense of priorities and our scientific judgment," she said.

Angell wrote that addiction is "exceedingly unlikely," and happens in probably no more than 0.1 percent of the time.●

By Mr. RIEGLE (for himself and Mr. LEVIN):

S. 2014. A bill to amend the Federal-State Extended Unemployment Compensation Act of 1970 to maintain current provisions—scheduled to be repealed—relating to the State trigger and to restore a former provision relating to the insured unemployment rate; to the Committee on Finance.

UNEMPLOYMENT BENEFITS

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I am today introducing legislation to repeal changes proposed in the President's last budget and enacted into law by the Reconciliation Act, in the level of unemployment required to trigger the payment of extended unemployment benefits.

Under current law, up to 13 additional weeks of extended unemployment compensation, beyond the usual maximum of 26 weeks of regular State benefits, are payable to unemployed individuals who exhaust their State benefits during periods of high unemployment.

Prior to the enactment of the Reconciliation Act of 1981, extended benefits were payable in any State in which the insured unemployment rate (IUR) was at least 4 percent, and in addition was 20 percent higher than the average of the same period in 2 previous years. When this so-called 20-percent factor was not met, a State, at its option, could provide extended benefits—and receive Federal matching of 50 percent in the cost of those benefits—whenever the State's insured unemployment rate reached 5 percent, regardless of how that compared to the insured unemployment rate in previous years.

The Reconciliation Act changed this system in two important ways. First, effective October 1982, it increased by a full percentage point the level of insured unemployment required to trigger the payment of extended benefits to jobless workers who have exhausted their regular State benefits. Effective October 1982, the State's insured unemployment rate must reach at least 5 percent, plus the 20-percent factor, or a flat 6 percent, regardless of how this compares to the insured unemployment rate in the past, in order for extended benefits to be payable to jobless workers in that State.

Second, the Reconciliation Act redefined the way in which the insured unemployment rate itself is calculated, to exclude all unemployed workers receiving extended benefits. The insured unemployment rate is a central aspect of the extended benefits program, because it is the basis for deciding whether or not extended benefits will be payable to workers in a particular State. The insured unemployment rate measures the percentage of unemployed workers who are collecting benefits under the unemployment insurance system. Prior to the Reconciliation Act, all unemployed persons receiving any type of unemployment insurance benefit were counted. Effective August 1981, however, only individuals filing claims for regular State unemployment would be included in calculating the extended benefit trigger rate. While this may appear on the surface to be a minor technical change, in fact it has had a very substantial impact on the calculation of the insured unemployment rate—with the result that States trigger off the extended benefits program far more rapidly than was previously the case. By excluding extended beneficiaries from the insured unemployment rate calculation, the Reconciliation Act dramatically shortened the periods for which extended benefits are payable in a particular State.

In my own State of Michigan, for example, the extended benefits program triggered on in October 1979. It remained in effect until November 7, 1981, when the program triggered off as a direct result of the change in the calculation of the insured unemployment rate. This occurred despite the fact that Michigan's November unemployment rate was 12.5 percent. Today, Michigan has an unemployment rate of 15.1 percent, but unemployed persons in my State are no longer eligible for extended benefits because of this technical change in the law.

Mr. President, the extended benefits program has become a mockery if it is unavailable in a State with an unemployment rate of 15.1 percent, in a State whose unemployment rate has been measured in double digits for 24 consecutive months. The budget proposals enacted into law in the Reconciliation Act have devastated the extended benefits program, and have rendered it virtually useless to jobless workers in my State. The changes made in the Reconciliation Act are a clear case of overkill, and they must be rectified without further delay.

When these proposals to change the extended benefits program triggers and the calculation of the insured unemployment rate first surfaced in the President's budget request, I warned that they would have a drastic impact on the extended benefits program. As a member of the Budget Committee, I offered an amendment to delete these changes from the budget. I regret that my amendment did not prevail at that time, but I hope that today the administration and the Congress will be prepared to admit that a serious mistake has been made and will take prompt action to correct it.

We are in the midst of a terrible recession, a recession which continues to deepen and which every day claims more and more victims. National unemployment now stands at 8.9 percent. In my own State of Michigan, unemployment has now reached 15.1 percent and 656,000 people are jobless.

In the past, the extended benefit program offered a vitally important protection to workers who lost their jobs during serious downturns in the economy. It helped to tide those workers through periods of especially high joblessness until they could find employment. It helped them to retain their homes and their hopes for the future. It provided, as well, an important cushion to the communities in which they lived, against the ripple effects of widespread joblessness among their citizens.

It is an important protection which has been disastrously diminished by an ill-conceived budget cut. It is a protection which we must restore without delay, if we are to meet our responsibilities to the growing pool of America's jobless workers. I urge my colleagues to join me in passing this legislation into law, to restore the extended benefits program to its former effectiveness.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2014

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a)(1) section 203(d) of the Federal-State Extended Unemployment Compensation Act of 1970 (as amended by section 2403 of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981) is amended—

(A) in paragraph (1)(B), by striking out "5" and inserting in lieu thereof "4"; and

(B) in the matter following paragraph (2), by striking out "the figure '5' contained in subparagraph (B) thereof were '6' " and inserting in lieu thereof "the figure '4' contained in subparagraph (B) thereof were '5' ".

(2) The amendments made by paragraph (1) shall become effective on the date of the enactment of this Act, and shall apply to weeks beginning on or after such date.

(b)(1) Section 203(e)(1)(A) of the Federal-State Extended Unemployment Compensation Act of 1970 (as amended cy section 2402 of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981) is amended by striking out "individuals filing claims for regular compensation" and inserting in lieu thereof "individuals filing claims for compensation (including regular, extended, and sharable regular compensation)".

(2) The amendment made by paragraph (1) shall apply for purposes of determining whether there are State "on" or "off" indicators for weeks beginning after August 13, 1981. For purposes of making such determinations for such weeks, such amendment shall be deemed to be in effect for all weeks, whether beginning before, on, or after August 13, 1981.

By Mr. DOMENICI:

S. 2015. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to limit the deduction of living expenses by Members of Congress and to require substantiation of such living expenses; to the Committee on Finance.

DEDUCTION OF LIVING EXPENSES BY MEMBERS OF CONGRESS

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, of the issues facing this Nation as we begin the 2d session of the 97th Congress one of the gravest is whether or not the Congress should raise taxes to offset the enormous deficit projected.

At the same time it has become evident that a tax measure passed by the Congress during the last session has gone far beyond our original intent. I refer to the changes made on the deductions applicable to congressional salaries.

Mr. President, while we talk of closing loopholes we have created an enormous one for ourselves. We have, in effect, exempted legislators from paying any taxes.

Originally the Congress voted to remove the $3,000 cap on deductions for having to take care of two residences. The limit of $3,000 was imposed in 1952 and its removal was reasonable since similar deductions are taken by other taxpayers.

Then in December an amendment attached to the black lung bill, allowing a blanket $75 per day deduction, passed. I voted against this amendment as did many of us in the Senate who foresaw the inequity it would cause. How can we in Congress reform the Tax Code and close unnecessary tax loopholes for special interests when we give ourselves one of the biggest exemption. It is up to Congress to show the example by making this the first tax loophole closed.

The legislation I introduce today would retroactively replace the cap on deductions at $6,000 and require substantiation for deductions. Thus those members who make use of this allowance are in the same circumstance as any other taxpayer. In an audit by IRS they will have to show their deductions.

Mr. President, a fair Tax Code is the reason voluntary compliance in payment of taxes works in our country. We must show the country that we are for tax equity, not tax loopholes.●

By Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD:

S.J. Res. 138. Joint resolution to authorize and request the President to designate the week of April 18, 1982, through April 24, 1982, as "National Coin Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL COIN WEEK

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, coin collecting in the United States is a major hobby. Since the early 1800's, there has been a keen interest in numismatics in the United States. Coins are closely related to history, and coin collecting is an educational hobby. The triumphs of the Roman legions, the California gold rush, the 18th century victories of the British Navy—these and thousands of other historical events are recorded on coins.

At the beginning of the 20th century, coin collecting was a hobby only for the few people deeply interested in the subject. They formed a national "clique" interested in coin research, finding great new rarities and new varieties. Many a pleasant hour was spent going over coin collections, pointing out prized pieces to friends. Trading and exchanging coins with fellow numismatists became "the" thing to do.

The first coin struck in America to commemorate an event, the Columbian half-dollar during the world's fair in Chicago in 1892, however, opened the eyes of millions to the possibilities of coin collecting and showed how it could be interesting and even profitable. Books, magazines, and newspapers on numismatics have steadily increased the number of coin collectors and are still a major factor in encouraging new ones. Another boon to numismatics was the resumption in 1936 of the manufacture of proof sets by the U.S. Mint in Philadelphia. The ever-spreading interest in coin collecting as a hobby is indicated by the increase of sets coined in 1950, 51,386, to 3,950,762 in 1964.

In the latter part of the 19th century, the American Numismatic Association was founded and began publishing America's first monthly magazine devoted exclusively to numismatics. Today, there are very few cities of respectable size that do not have a coin club.

National Coin Week was first introduced in 1924. Now an annual event, the association designates a week to encourage and promote the interest of young and old in a subject that is entertaining and instructive, as well as valuable in encouraging thrift.

The theme, "Numismatics—A High Road to Adventure," has been adopted for this year's event to make noncollectors aware of the challenge and excitement inherent in coin collecting. In cooperation with this effort, I am today introducing a joint resolution to designate April 18 to 24, 1982, as "National Coin Week."

I hope for early consideration of the resolution.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

MISSISSIPPIANS PROUD OF LENNIE SKUTNIK

● Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, the recent tragedy involving an airliner crash upon takeoff from National Airport prompted many brave responses by many people in an effort to rescue the victims of this air disaster. One that aroused a great deal of interest nationwide, but especially in my home State of Mississippi, was the heroic act of Lennie Skutnik, who dove into the icy waters of the Potomac River and managed to pull a struggling woman close enough to shore for rescue workers to get her out of the water and save her life.

Lennie Skutnik was born in Biloxi, Miss., and his mother now lives in Columbia, so there was naturally considerable interest and attention focused on his act of heroism. There were many accounts of his action in the news media of our State, and people have commented to me about how proud they were that one of our native sons responded in this crisis in such a fine manner.

I take this opportunity to join those who have saluted Lennie Skutnik for his dramatic rescue action, and on behalf of the people of his home State, thank him and wish him well in the future.

Certainly, his action is an inspiration to all Americans, and I take this opportunity at the opening of the 2d session of the 97th Congress to bring his brave deed to the attention of the Members of the Senate.●

TAX-EXEMPT STATUS FOR PRIVATE SCHOOLS

● Mr. HART. Mr. President, the administration's confusing policy reversals of the last 2 weeks on the issue of tax-exempt status for private schools that practice racial discrimination have been unfortunate and unnecessary. The new statute which the administration has proposed only adds to the confusion.

Current Federal law is clear. The Internal Revenue Service is authorized and required to deny tax-exempt status to private schools which discriminate on the basis of race. When the Senate reconvenes on Thursday, January 28, I will submit a resolution expressing the sense of the Senate that current Federal law clearly authorizes and mandates the IRS to enforce this policy. This reflects the position taken by the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights and a number of major civil rights organizations. I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this resolution.●

REAGANOMICS AT WORK

● Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, before the term "Reaganomics" was coined, residents of Maine's Lincoln County were exemplifying some of its soundest principles. When faced with cancellation of the construction of a family recreation center 6 years ago because of a shortage of EDA money, these spirited Mainers decided that a shortage of Federal funding was not going to stop them from fulfilling their goals.

This article, by Bill Caldwell, a popular writer and columnist for the Maine Sunday Telegram, tells how residents in the town of Damariscotta and surrounding communities rallied together to volunteer their work, time, furniture, equipment, and a little pocket money to create a facility of which the midcoastal area is very proud today. I submit for the RECORD and commend to my colleagues this story of how Maine independence and ingenuity can overcome adversity.

"REAGANOMICS" AT WORK DOWN EAST

(By Bill Caldwell)

Inside the White House, they've never heard of the Central Lincoln County Family Recreation Center on the Waldoboro Road in Damariscotta. More's the pity, because what is happening here would bring smiles of satisfaction to the high priests of Reaganomics this smileless January.

I can see David Stockman and Ed Meese and even President Reagan smacking their lips over this example of how the new "Reagan federalism" is working almost perfectly on a tiny scale in a small Maine town.

But what you see depends on where you sit. And from where they sit in Maine, Wayne Plummer, Linda Hicks, Ray Perkins and Hilare LeBon see the CLC very differently. "Sure, federal funds helped build the building. And CETA funds met our little payroll to start with," says Plummer. "But now, a few years later, we don't get a penny of subsidy from anyone—state or town. We pay our own way. And we are flourishing, bigger and better than ever."

To them and the 1,000 members of the CLC Recreation Center, there are no politics and no Reagan economics involved. It is just the Maine way of doing things for yourself, without handouts.

Yet Plummer, who has been director from the start, says CLC is unique. "There is nothing like it anywhere else in Maine to my knowledge. Maybe nowhere else in the country," he says.

Before the January snows stop flying, about 8,000 people will walk through the center's doors. That's almost six times the population of Damariscotta. They arrive in pick-up trucks, on bikes, in rusted-out cars, in sleek Mercedes, on buses, and a few come stomping through the snow on foot. Babies arrive wrapped in snug blankets; some people in their eighties hobble in on a cane. This is a gathering place for all ages, all incomes, all residents of Central Lincoln County.

They come, from 6:30 in the morning until nine at night, to play tennis and racquetball, work out on weights, wrestle, join exercise and slimnastics classes, learn dancing or karate, shoot pool or play electronic games, play basketball and volleyball, for lessons in cross country skiing and ice skating, or to jog or play ping pong. Some bring dogs to obedience classes, some come for prenatal exercise class, to learn cardio-pulmonary resuscitation techniques, others to hear lectures on nutrition or get help in applying for fuel assistance this winter. Come summer, the programs change to swimming lessons at two lakeside beaches, baseball and softball, scuba diving, golf and day camps for kids.

Does it all sound more like an expensive country club or resort than a recreation center in a small Maine town? Or does it sound like a heavily subsidized "do-gooder" program paid for by taxpayers?

Well, it is neither. It is a no-frills, hugely popular, local operation which has added enormously to the good life in 12 small Maine communities and which is entirely paid for by the people who use it.

It is a success story which might be copied in lots of other places. Here is how it happened.

It all began six years ago, born from a hope that failed. The hope was to raise $250,000 to start a YMCA. But by 1977, after two years of effort, only $30,000 in cash and $30,000 in pledges had been raised, even though the late Edward Freeman had given eight acres on which to build. Then Priscilla House, who worked in the Lincoln County planning office at Wiscasset and had the inside track, told the "Y" committee that if the concept of a recreation center was turned over to the town, Damariscotta might try making application for Economic Development Agency funds, earmarked for municipal improvements which would create jobs. Nearby Waldoboro had gotten EDA money to build new town offices and Boothbay had gotten funds for repairing bridges, she said. Some money was still left for Lincoln County, she added, but time was running out and speed in making application would be essential.

So the "Y" committee quickly got together with the selectmen of Damariscotta and together they agreed to turn over the cash raised by the "Y" plus the eight acres of land donated by Freeman to the town, which would then apply for an EDA grant to build a recreation center.

Within a few weeks Damariscotta got a $250,000 grant for the recreation center.

Then came the bad news. The lowest bid, in 1977, was $400,000. Plans were trimmed, deleting two handball courts, an upstairs auditorium, money for furnishings and sports equipment, site preparation work, a parking lot, and the cost of a heating oil tank and a septic tank.

When all these cuts had been made, the bid was reduced to $300,000, a lot more still than the $250,000 grant.

But citizens of Damariscotta were fired up by the idea of helping. So everyone who had given to the "Y" fund agreed to using the money to build the recreation center. Local businesses gave in kind. Neil Sprague, who ran a heating oil company, donated the oil tank. Chester Rice, a local contractor, said he would donate the septic system. Other citizens in the construction business—Oliver Wendell Holmes, the Johnston Brothers, the Hunt Brothers and Chester Rice—said they would volunteer to do the site preparation work. Others gave furniture and equipment. Plummer, though not on the payroll, agreed to coordinate the work and to go out speaking to Rotary, Lions, Elks and other civic groups to raise money. Quickly the money came in, mostly in small donations, and from surrounding towns as well as Damariscotta.

Memberships poured in, even though the center was still being built. Linda Hicks, a physical education teacher, joined as program director and began a summer day camp. Soon she had 150 kids enrolled. By September 1978, only one year after the EDA application had been hurriedly filed, the center was open for business with 400 members.

There were birth pangs. When the unpaved parking lot turned into a quagmire of mud during the winter thaws, a "mud drive" was launched, and the people who'd just finished a tennis game or volleyball would toss in a dollar or two toward getting the parking area hot-topped. Now it is.

Money was raised through dances and suppers and rummage sales for a racquetball court, now in constant use. Money was raised to furnish and equip a senior citizens room. The wrestling team has become Maine and New England champion. A baseball diamond has been built, half paid for by a $10,000 grant from the Interior Department.

Thanks to the CLC, life hereabouts has a new dimension. Visit here on almost any day, and you'll see storekeepers, retired executives, fishermen and school teachers playing together in tennis matches. You'll see handicapped adults enjoying an uproarious game of basketball. You'll see pregnant mothers taking prenatal exercise, while young husbands practice karate. You'll see middle-aged women losing weight and tightening muscles in exercise classes. You'll see school kids playing basketball at night.

This year, 1,100 members of all ages and sizes will come 60,000 times to join in sports and social activities which this part of Lincoln County seldom enjoyed before.

The facility is mortgage-free, with an estimated value of $500,000. Not a penny of tax money is used for its operation. Last year expenses totaled $70,000, including the salaries of four staffers who were once paid by CETA but are now paid by the income from membership dues ($25 a year for senior citizens up to $110 for an entire family). Income from dues and fees for special programs raised $77,000.

Cost and dues are low, because everyone helps do the work. On Sundays, for example, the board of directors take turns manning the desk and phones. Should money run a bit low, the board of directors won't ask the government for a subsidy. Instead, they'll get the kids to put a rock band together and throw a sock hop.

That's the small town Maine way to make ends meet and have a good time doing it. But in Washington, they like to call it Reaganomics.●

TRAGEDY CALLED FORTH HEROISM

● Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, the tragic air crash in Washington January 13 demonstrated anew that catastrophic events often call forth the finest human qualities. I refer to the heroic actions of two men whose courage and presence of mind resulted in the rescue of six persons from the icy waters of the Potomac River.

One was an as-yet-unidentified passenger who repeatedly passed a helicopter rescue line to others rather than allow himself to be hoisted to safety. Five people owe their lives to this man, who forfeited his own.

The other hero was Martin Leonard Skutnik, a 28-year-old Government employee from Lorton, Va. Acting on a simple, selfless instinct, he dove into the freezing waters to rescue a drowning woman. This was an example of courage and selflessness that helped make America great. I am proud of my fellow Virginian.

On a day of disaster, the bravery and sacrifice of these men penetrated the gloom and brought each of us some solace.

Their heroism is more fully detailed in an account by Joseph Kingsbury-Smith, national editor of the Hearst Newspapers. I ask that his story be printed in the RECORD, as well as a fine column by Mary McGrory in the Washington Post.

HEROISM

(By Joseph Kingsbury Smith)

WASHINGTON.—What history may record as among the great examples of individual courage and compassion marked the tragedy which sent an Air Florida jetliner plunging into the freezing waters of the Potomac River Jan. 13th with the loss of 78 lives.

Two of the heroes who saved the lives of drowning victims of the air crash displayed the quality of mind and spirit that enables a human being to face danger with fearlessness.

One of the men who gave his own life to save the lives of three women and two men remains an unknown hero. He disappeared beneath the ice floes after passing a helicopter rescue line, one by one, to each of the other victims as they all struggled to keep their heads above water.

The other man, although married with two young children, risked his life to dive into the icy water to rescue a young woman who had lost her hold on the helicopter rescue line.

The selfless heroism of these two men exemplified the highest ideals of humanity that makes man at times a noble animal. It was the same type of bravery that led more than one G.I. in the Vietnam war to fling himself on an about to explode hand grenade and give his life to save the lives of his buddies.

It belied cynics who have contended that the American people have become soft and lack the guts of their forefathers.

"These two men set an example of the courage and selflessness that helped make America the great nation it is," Senator Harry F. Byrd, Jr., (Ind-Va.) said. "I am proud of my fellow Virginian," he added, referring to Martin (Lenny) Skutnik, the young man who dove into the freezing river to rescue Priscilla Tirado, whose husband and infant son perished.

The amazing courage and sacrifice of the so far unidentified man who gave to five other people the helicopter lifeline that could have saved his life was related by the 2-man team of a Federal Park Police helicopter that rescued them. These two men, Donald W. Usher and M. E. Windsor, were also heroes since they conducted the rescue operations under conditions of extreme danger to the helicopter.

Officer Usher, the pilot, who flew combat rescue missions in Vietnam, said they could only see the head of the man in the water. He was baldish, with a heavy mustache and grey sideburns. He appeared to be in his mid-50s.

He was among six people they sighted clinging to the tail section of the plane which had broken away when the aircraft hit the 14th Steet Bridge within minutes after taking off from National Airport in a snowstorm.

Usher brought the helicopter down almost to the water, and even dipped its landing skids beneath the surface, while Wind Sor, his paramedic, threw down a rescue line.

The baldish man, who appeared more alert than the others in the icy water with him, grabbed the line. He could have then been hoisted to safety. Instead, he passed the line to the nearest woman and helped put it around her. When she had been hoisted aboard, the line was dropped again four separate times. Each time, the unknown hero took the line and passed it to the other two women and two men.

When the five had been hoisted aboard, Usher had to take off because there was no more room and ice was forming on the helicopter.

As soon as the survivors had been landed on the shore, Usher and Windsor returned to the scene to rescue the man. He had disappeared beneath the ice floes. Usher said he had never seen such courage, not even in Vietnam.

The action of Skutnik was equally heroic. Although he saved only one life, he risked his own to do so and he was not in the water when he went to the rescue of the young woman.

His car had been stopped in the traffic jam and he was standing on the shore watching the helicopter rescue efforts. A dozen or more other people, including police and firemen, were also standing there. Skutnik, age 28, saw a woman lose her grip on the lifeline, apparently too weak to hold on.

Without a moment's hesitation, and although he never had any life-saving courses, he took off his coat and boots, dove into the freezing water, swam through the ice floes to the woman, grabbed her and brought her back to shore.

While sitting shivering in an ambulance that was about to take him and several survivors to a hospital, Skutnik noticed that a man with two broken legs was also shivering. He took off his coat and gave it to the man.

At the hospital, he was treated for hypothermia, given a hot bath and released to go to his home in Lorton, Va., about 20 miles south of Washington.

An ordinary fellow without any training for death-risking heroism, he later told reporters, "I did it because nobody else was doing anything to save the woman. Somebody had to go in the water. I didn't think about any risk. I knew I could swim and I had to try to do something to save the woman."

A $14,000 a year employee of the Congressional Budget Office, who runs errands and performs odd jobs, Skutnik has worked as a hamburger cook, strip-and-wax man at Ralph's supermarket in Simi Valley, Calif., a meatpacker, and house painter.

He told the Washington Post that a big night out is taking his pretty wife, Linda, and two boys, to a pizza joint, adding: "Every once in a while we'll close our eyes and blow a couple of bucks."

When Frank Rohr, Creative Director, of Rolex, was informed by the Hearst Newspapers that Skutnik had lost his watch in the water, he said a stainless steel submariner watch would be sent immediately to him as a gift.

President Reagan, who hailed Skutnik's courage, may give him a presidential commendation.

LENNY SKUTNIK GAVE US ALL A LIFELINE

(By Mary McGrory)

DECENCY

On the raw, gray morning after two ghastly accidents had all but wiped out the city, people were hanging on to one man, somebody they never heard about before Jan. 13.

He is Martin Skutnik, called "Lenny." He is 28 years old, a messenger at the Congressional Budget Office. His heroism at the 14th Street Bridge was one bright patch on a black day.

People who watched, over and over, scenes from the two refrigerated horrors—death in the frozen Potomac, death in a dark tunnel—stopped flinching and shivering only during the sequence in which Lenny Skutnik appeared.

A group of rescue workers are standing on the river bank. A few yards offshore, a woman is floundering amid the ice floes. The helicopter lets down a life preserver. The woman grabs it, but it slides out of her hands. The helicopter tries again. She does not have the strength, maybe not even the will, to grab it.

Suddenly, a young man is breaking away from the group. He plunges into the river. He swims strongly towards the woman, who has laid her head back on the water. He reaches her, seizes her, and heads for the shore. A man in a yellow slicker rushes forward to meet them with a rope. The woman, whose eyes are back in her head, is laid down on the snowy slope.

Salvation.

Skutnik was taken to the hospital, treated for exposure, and inevitably came before the cameras. He is a perfectly ordinary-looking young man in a sheepskin coat. He has a mustache, a husky build. His manner is modest to the point of humility.

On "Nightline," he is importuned by the perfectly coiffed host to say "what was going through your mind" before he dived into the frigid water.

Skutnik was having none of it. He had made his statement by his plunge. It was simply that he had seen the frustration of the rescue team. None of the ropes were long enough to reach the victim. As to "what you were thinking" when he got to the shore, he remarked matter-of-factly, "I was relieved I got her out."

The Congressional Budget Office people were pretty puffed up about Skutnik's feat. So were all the other government workers in Washington. One of them had shown what stuff there is in the despised bureaucracy, most of which was branded "nonessential" when Ronald Reagan showily closed down the government on Nov. 23.

The director of the CBO, Alice Rivlin, called up to congratulate him. So did his immediate boss, Stanley Gregg, head of the Intergovernmental Relations Section, where Skutnik has worked since the spring of 1980. Previously he did construction work, and for a while he had a clerical job in the Arlington office of the Social Security Administration.

Gregg reports that Skutnik is exemplary on the job, "gets in early, is always thoughtful and pleasant, never grumbles."

Rivlin and Gregg gave him an extra day of annual leave—he was taking a few days anyway. They felt even the president would approve.

Skutnik told Gregg that he was inundated by calls and invitations to appear on television shows. He doesn't want to travel the celebrity route. His wife said he's the kind of man everybody in the neighborhood goes to when they have trouble.

He happened to be there to save a woman's life because he was on his way home to Lorton. Like the rest of the government, he had been let out early because of the blizzard. When he saw the fearful commotion at the bridge—ambulances, helicopters, passengers bobbing in the water—he stopped his car, got out and joined the frustrated workers on the bank.

He watched for a while, then shucked off his coat and his boots and dived in. Lucky for all of us, he was not one of those bystanders who hears cries for help and pass on. He got involved.

He plainly doesn't think there is anything special about what he did. His attitude, and we must hope it is contagious, seems to be, "Wouldn't anybody?"

On a killer day, in a brutal winter, he threw us all a lifeline by reminding us that decency is not dead. He may get the glory treatment whether he wants it or not. Television crews may stake out his house. Public officials will wish to be seen with him. We are painfully short of heroes, of examples of valor and mercy.

Little else about Jan. 13 bears thinking about. An ambulance official said somberly about the subway victims that they may have been trampled to death. A passenger, who survived the crash, and is himself a pilot, said from his hospital bed that he thinks the pilot of Flight 90 thought of aborting the takeoff seconds too late. The divers didn't have heated suits.

The day brought another hero, an unknown man who directed the helicopters to passengers he thought in greater need. He sank before he could be rescued. We know about Lenny Skutnik. We thank him for his presence on Doomsday.●

LANDON SHARES REAGAN'S VIEW ON ROOSEVELT

● Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, from time to time, former Kansas Gov. Alf M. Landon has shared his wisdom and experience by giving his views on world affairs.

The Senator from Kansas submits for the RECORD the Governor's most recent interview.

The material follows:

[From the Kansas City Times, Dec. 25, 1981]

LANDON SHARES REAGAN'S VIEW ON ROOSEVELT—HE RECALLS ACCUSING F.D.R. OF ADVOCATING FASCISM DURING WAR

TOPEKA.—Alf M. Landon, the Republican who challenged Democrat Franklin D. Roosevelt's bid for a second term in 1936 and lost, said Thursday that he agreed with President Reagan's view that FDR's New Deal administration espoused a fascist philosophy.

It is not a new position for Mr. Landon, now 94.

In the spring of 1940 he rebuffed overtures from Mr. Roosevelt to join his Cabinet and accused the president of trying to undermine the two-party political system in the United States.

In an interview Thursday, Mr. Landon recalled the speculation that Mr. Roosevelt planned to ask him to become secretary of war. Mr. Landon rejected the idea before a formal invitation was made, but Mr. Roosevelt did appoint Mr. Landon's 1936 vice presidential running mate, Frank Knox of Chicago, as secretary of the Navy.

"That is a concrete example of President Roosevelt trying to make it a one-party election (in 1940). That sustains everything President Reagan says about President Roosevelt," Mr. Landon said.

Mr. Reagan said in an interview with the Public Broadcasting Service, widely publicized this week, that many of those in the Roosevelt administration, which ran from 1933 to 1945, espoused fascism. He cited as evidence what he said was their commitment to a permanently managed economy.

Mr. Landon agreed with Mr. Reagan's assessment. He said he came to that conclusion more than 38 years ago, referring to a speech he made in 1943 in which he said the Roosevelt administration was following "the facist theory of a planned economy."

"Roosevelt said in 1935 he was going to manage the economy of the country." Mr. Landon said, "I said that meant a huge federal bureaucracy, and look what we have now."

Mr. Landon, the governor of Kansas from 1933 to 1937, also cited as evidence that FDR sought one-party rule. Mr. Roosevelt's perceived attempt to form a coalition government of Republicans and Democrats in early 1940, and the suggestion by some that the United States need not hold a presidential election that year because of the war spreading across Europe.

"Isn't fascism the attempt to eliminate the opposition party?" Mr. Landon asked, "Isn't calling off an election a fascist move?"

In an interview at the Topeka Daily Capital on May 20, 1940, Mr. Landon opposed suggestions by political columnists that a coalition government be formed to avoid a potentially divisive campaign, with world war imminent.

"I regard as dangerous any attempt to decrease the vitality of the two-party system as it operates in this country," Mr. Landon said then.

That same day The New York Times reported that there was a strong chance that Mr. Roosevelt, "faced with widespread national concern over the developments of the European war," was "seriously considering the appointment of several prominent Republicans to secretaryships in a coalition Cabinet."

The Times said FDR was considering naming Mr. Knox as secretary of the Navy and Mr. Landon as secretary of war.

Mr. Landon was invited by Mr. Roosevelt to a White House luncheon on May 22, and stopped off in Chicago on his way to the nation's capital by train.

The Chicago Tribune quoted Mr. Landon as saying he had received a White House message "rescinding the invitation" to meet with FDR.

Mr. Landon said Thursday that he never learned directly, but always had a suspicion that Edwin M. Watson, Mr. Roosevelt's aide-de-camp, called off the meeting because of Mr. Landon's statements in the interview with the Topeka newspaper opposing a coalition government. Mr. Landon also had given a speech in Warrensburg, Mo., criticizing FDR's foreign policy.

Mr. Landon, the father of U.S. Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum, decided to return to Topeka, telling the Tribune, "I started for Washington, as I always do, at the invitation of my president. I am going home at his invitation. I am ready to go to Washington at any time at the invitation of my president."

Nobody ever knew quite what happened at the White House, Mr. Landon said, but Mr. Roosevelt personally called him in Chicago, told him there had been a mix-up and the invitation to lunch still stood. So Mr. Landon went on to Washington after all.

He had a nearly two-hour private meeting with the president. The matter of a coalition government and Mr. Landon's participation as secretary of war never came up, he said.

After leaving the meeting with Mr. Roosevelt, Mr. Landon issued a statement at a Washington news conference, which said in part:

"If President Roosevelt is interested in unselfish service, he should publicly and forthwith eliminate himself as a third-term candidate. The president would become the leader of a nation instead of the head of a party.

"If he does eliminate himself . . . Republicans can and will participate. To suggest that President Roosevelt is the only man in the nation to carry on, or that the national election should be canceled or allowed to go by default, is to use the same argument the Nazis use in behalf of Hitler."

ANNIVERSARY OF KIM DAE-JUNG SENTENCE

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, last January 23 marked the first anniversary of the South Korean Supreme Court's upholding of the death sentence of democratic opposition leader Kim Dae-Jung. Since then, this sentence was commuted to life imprisonment, which Kim Dae-Jung continues to serve under extremely harsh conditions in South Korea.

On this same date, 123 political, cultural, and religious leaders in five countries issued simultaneous appeals for the release of Kim Dae-Jung from prison. I hope that the South Korean Government will heed these earnest appeals and take early action to permit Mr. Kim to return to his family. The positive internal and international reaction to the decision to commute Mr. Kim's death sentence, as well as to release last Christmas nine less well-known prisoners related with both the Kim Dae-Jung and the Kwangju trials, should make clear to the authorities in Seoul that the early release of Kim Dae-Jung would be in the best interests of both reconciliation and the international standing of the Republic of Korea.

Mr. President, I ask that a statement by the North American Coalition for Human Rights in Korea, the text of the international appeal for the release of Kim Dae-Jung, and the list of the endorsers of the appeal be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The material follows:

KIM DAE-JUNG SENTENCE

One hundred twenty-three political cultural and religious leaders in Washington, Toronto, Tokyo, Melbourne, and Berlin today issued simultaneous appeals for the release from prison of South Korean democratic leader Kim Dae Jung. A joint international statement marking the anniversary of the January 23, 1981, action by the Korean Supreme Court upholding the death sentence for Mr. Kim stated that "continued confinement of Mr. Kim cannot be justified or condoned when viewed from the standpoint of justice and humanity" and urged his immediate release by the government of South Korea.

The appeal was initiated by religious groups in Japan and the United States and included among its endorsers many prominent political and academic leaders from Japan, the United States, Canada, Germany, Australia, and New Zealand, countries which are South Korea's closest economic and political allies. Signers of the appeal include Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Minneapolis Mayor Donald Fraser, and former Assistant Secretary of State Patrica Derian in the United States, former Japanese Foreign Minister Katsuo Shionoya and Richard von Weizsaeker, mayor of Berlin. Fifteen members of the Japanese National Diet, primarily from the ruling Liberal Democratic Party, signed the statement as did 15 members of the U.S. Congress. The heads of councils of churches in Canada, the United States, Japan, and Australia are among its endorsers, along with the heads of a number of national Catholic and protestant organizations and orders. Major academic and literary figures, including Prof. John Fairbank of Harvard, Japanese novelist Oe Kensaburo and former chief editor of Japan's Asahi newspaper Kyozo Mori, joined in calling for Mr. Kim's release.

Kim Dae-jung, the leader of the movement in South Korea to restore democratic government, was arrested in a sweep of opposition leaders that accompanied the coup d'etat of Maj. Gen. Chun Doo-hwan on May 17, 1980. He was subsequently sentenced to death by a military tribunal. An international outcry prevented the death sentence from being carried out. On the same day that the Korean Supreme Court, packed by the new military strongman, upheld his sentence, it was commuted to life. For this act, Chun Doo-hwan, just prior to being elected (without opposition) as president, was rewarded by the new Reagan administration by being invited as the "first foreign head of state" to visit Washington in 1981.

The commutation of Kim Dae-jung's death sentence has often been pointed to by Reagan administration officials as the best indication of the efficacy of their new "quiet diplomacy" approach to human rights. But Mr. Kim has remained in solitary confinement for nineteen months. He is kept now under extremely harsh circumstances in Chungju prison, without adequate heat or food and is denied medical treatment for his swollen legs and infected ears. He is not allowed any visitors except his wife, who may see him under observation for some ten to twenty minutes, once a month. Thirteen other well-known democratic leaders who were tried with Mr. Kim are kept in even more severe conditions in other prisons throughout Korea, along with hundreds of lesser known persons.

In Washington, D.C., a rally calling for Mr. Kim's release will be held Saturday evening, January 23rd, at the Sixth Presbyterian Church (16th St. & Kennedy, N.W.) beginning at 7 p.m. the main speakers are exiled Korean theologian Dr. Tong-hwan Moon, brother of one of Kim Dae-jung's fellow prisoners, and Dr. George Ogle, United Methodist official who was expelled from Korea in 1974 for protesting the death penalty of other political prisoners. Sponsors of the rally include the North American Coalition for Human Rights in Korea and the Korean Congress for Democracy and Unification.

In other cities throughout the United States, the day will be marked by protest demonstrations in front of Korean consulates and by the presentation of petitions to consular officials.

The full text of the International Appeal and a list of its endorsers follows:

AN EARNEST, INTERNATIONAL APPEAL, REQUESTING THAT MR. KIM DAE-JUNG BE RELEASED FROM PRISON

It was a year ago that voices around the world were raised in unison, in protest of the authorities' clear intention to take the life of a democratic politician.

Although "Vox Coeli" and "Vox Populi"—the voice from heaven and the voice of the people—compelled the authorities to spare Mr. Kim Dae-jung's life, they merely shifted his sentence to a legally unjustifiable term of life imprisonment, and he has spent the last year in a Chungju Prison solitary confinement cell. Since his arrest on May 17, 1980, fully one year and seven months have now passed. With the onset of severe winter weather, moreover, his neuralgic ailment is being aggravated, with increased pain in his waist and legs.

Continued confinement of Mr. Kim cannot be justified or condoned when viewed from the standpoint of justice and humanity. On the one hand, the government of the Republic of Korea publicly speaks of "Liberation from Political Oppression" and "Creation of a Democratic Welfare Society." We are at pains to understand these pronouncements for, on the other hand, the same government continues to hold Mr. Kim under detention. On this, the first anniversary of the Supreme Court's ruling against him, we would request of the government of the Republic of Korea that Mr. Kim Dae-jung be released, and that he be allowed to seek medical attention for his ongoing ailment.

At this very moment, as we listen painfully to the news about the suffering being endured by the people of Poland, we renew our conviction that the people's voice demanding Democracy, Freedom, and Independence is the universal voice of all humanity surpassing all boundaries of social systems and nationality. We are convinced that no power on earth can suppress that voice. We have cherished in our heart a deep respect for the people of the Republic of Korea, who continue to keep lit that burning will for Democracy.

Standing firmly on this conviction, we earnestly request of the government of the Republic of Korea that Mr. Kim Dae-jung be released.

January 22, 1982.

A HEAVY LOAD

● Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, when the Senate debates the regulatory reform bill later this year, an attempt will be made to amend the bill so as to give Congress the power to veto agency rules. I hope that the Senate defeats such an amendment. Members of this body who are inclined to support the legislative veto would be well advised to read Michael Wines' editorial in the National Journal for January 2, 1982. Mr. Wines points out that the legislative veto could triple the workload of the Congress, subjecting Members of this body to "intense lobbying" on "issues ranging from the proper pulp content of lemon juice to the operation of off-road vehicles in wildlife preserves."

Such efforts might be worthwhile if the legislative veto promised to be an effective course to check the regulatory bureaucracy, but the fact of the matter is that the veto is cumbersome, clumsy, and ferociously inefficient. As a member of the Commerce Committee, I can testify to the problems we have encountered in attempting to provide a fair and comprehensive review of one rule—and a simple rule at that—the FTC's used car rule. What can we expect when hundreds of rules are presented to us for review? If we want to curb the bureaucracy, let us go back to the statute books and rewrite the laws that gave the bureaucrats power in the first place. If agencies are arbitrary or idiotic in their actions, there are ways to trim their wings without turning the Senate into some regulatory review board for final determinations on lemon pulp.

Mr. President, I ask that Mr. Wines' article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The article follows:

A HEAVY LOAD

(By Michael Wines)

Congress has many virtues, but in the public's eye, at least, a penchant for hard work is not among them. During 1980, for instance, its Members introduced 4,423 legislative measures, of which 1,643 were passed, after careful deliberation and any number of four-day fact-finding weekends. That is about three bills or resolutions per Member, and Congress's total output is not a lot more than some state legislatures knock off in 90 days.

So it may come as a surprise to learn that the House and Senate are seriously considering an idea that could triple their workload, subject them to even more intense lobbying from interest groups and immerse them in issues ranging from the proper pulp content of lemon juice to the operation of off-road vehicles in wildlife preserves.

The idea is to give Congress, and perhaps the President, the power to veto some or all of the thousands of rules promulgated each year by federal regulatory bodies. It is an idea that has been called the ultimate check on the untrammeled power of the bureaucracy, and it also has been called "the dumbest idea ever peddled on Capitol Hill," in the words of a congressional staffer.

About the only thing most people agree on is that it is an idea whose time has come—or will come, probably early this year.

Three major forms of the veto proposals are now being considered by Congress, and they vary widely in both scope and substance. Many observers predict that one of the three will be adopted as law, perhaps as early as spring.

A House bill on regulatory reform (HR 746) would require agencies to submit every so-called major regulation—usually, with an economic impact of more than $100 million a year—to Congress. Congressional committees would have 30 days to issue a resolution of disapproval; otherwise, the regulation would be considered in force. If a resolution did emerge from committee, Congress would have another 60 days to adopt a joint resolution vetoing the rule. The resolution would then go to the President for his signature or veto.

That is the simplest of the veto proposals. A second House measure (HR 1776) would funnel each new regulation through Congress, where either chamber could stop it by issuing a veto resolution. The veto would effectively reject the rule unless the other chamber chose to override it. The President would have no say in the matter.

Meanwhile, the Senate is expected to consider an amendment to its own regulatory reform bill (S. 1080) that would require both the Senate and the House—but not the President—to approve a veto resolution in order to reject a proposed rule. All rules would be subject to review, although the procedures would vary for major and minor regulations.

Backers of the proposals offer persuasive arguments for their adoption: that the veto power would act as a check on rampant overregulation; that it would trim the broad, vague grants of power given many agencies in their enabling legislation; that it would transfer power from insulated bureaucrats back to where it belongs—with the elected representatives.

Good arguments, all. But if the record books and the history books offer any guidance, Congress may have problems giving regulations adequate review.

Nobody really knows how many rules the federal government churns out each year, but Congress' best estimates range from 7,500 to 9,000, figures that probably have been diluted by President Reagan's war on the bureaucracy.

Some of those rules pass into the books virtually unnoticed and unopposed. Most—especially the major ones—are supported and opposed by active, vocal constituencies.

Congress' major experiment with the legislative veto is being carried out now, and the first results are not encouraging. After giving itself a veto over Federal Trade Commission rules in 1980, the House and Senate have become mired in a political battle over the very first FTC measure sent to them—a heavily watered-down proposal to regulate used-car sales.

Used-car sales seem an ideal target for FTC policing: studies by two state auto clubs, for instance, turned up a total of 1,312 defects in a sample of used cars, only 87 of which had been disclosed by dealers. A third study indicated that 17.1 per cent of used-car dealers sampled in Wisconsin gave buyers inaccurate information about the condition of cars offered for sale.

Moreover, the FTC's proposed rule is relatively innocuous. It would require dealers to place a sticker on auto windshields disclosing any mechanical defects that they know about and stating the terms of any warranties offered. The cost would be about 18 cents per sticker.

Nevertheless, only a parliamentary delay by Sen. Bob Packwood, R-Ore., has prevented a veto from sweeping through Congress. The FTC has been accused of burdening dealers with paperwork and overstepping its authority, but the real reason for the opposition seems apparent: the National Automobile Dealers Association, with 20,000 members and more than $400,000 in contributions to congressional candidates, doesn't like the rule. Many of the rule's leading congressional opponents received auto dealer contributions.

If the used-car story is not an exercise in civics-book democracy, neither is it an argument in itself for leaving the rule-making powers with the bureaucrats.

But multiplied by 9,000 times—or even by 200 or 300 times—the argument gains some force. And it gains more steam when one considers that a legislative veto would apply to deregulatory efforts as well as more traditional regulations.

In 1980, for instance, Congress resisted stiff industry lobbying to pass a law easing regulation of the interstate trucking industry. It is easy to question whether lawmakers could have resisted similar pressures to thwart the subsequent implementing regulations that opened up trucking routes and rate schedules to more competition.

One of the joys of federal lawmaking seems to be that Members of Congress can take the responsibility for sweeping new laws and little of the blame for the necessary bureaucratic rules that implement them. With a legislative veto, Congress appears ready to assume both burdens—and even a hardworking lawmaker may find that a heavy load to bear.●

DEATH OF FORMER CHILEAN PRESIDENT, EDUARDO FREI MONTALVA

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, it is with great sadness that I learned of the death of former Chilean President Eduardo Frei Montalva, on January 22. Throughout his brilliant career, President Frei understood the critical need of his people, and remained committed to democratic reform in Latin America. Because of sweeping social changes, Presidents Kennedy and Johnson looked to President Frei as an initiator of rapid development without repression or violence. Motivated by ideals of democracy and social justice, President Frei initiated agrarian reform, restructuring of copper mines, and social programs in health and housing. In his vision of a "reformist revolution," he showed himself to be not only a man devoted to his people, but a realist when he prophetically said,

I offer neither immediate solutions nor immediate prosperity, but sacrifice in the present for prosperity in the future.

In September 1973, Chile's hopes for democracy were jolted by a violent military coup. Former President Frei's determination to see social justice was not thwarted by this tragic setback. Even with the coup and the military decision to outlaw Frei's Christian Democratic Party, he continued to speak out, deploring the undemocratic and repressive procedures practiced by the military. In a courageous move hailed by Chileans and supporters of democracy around the world, President Frei denounced the plebiscite vote in September 1980, when a new constitution was voted in, a constitution tailored to the needs and whims of the military and ignorant of the needs of the people.

At a time when all too many countries in this hemisphere are ruled by dictators and military cliques, the people of Chile looked to former President Frei, an eloquent leader who steadfastly called for a return to democratic processes and the restoration of human rights.

All of us who share President Frei's vision of economic and social justice, have lost a valued friend. May that vision live on to inspire generations to come in the never-ending struggle to preserve and protect basic freedoms and human dignity.●

STATEMENT OF SENATOR JEREMIAH DENTON RECOMMENDING SENATE CONSIDERATION OF "CONGRESS VERSUS THE PRESIDENT," BY SENATOR JOHN TOWER

Mr. DENTON. Mr. President, as we begin the second session of the 97th Congress, the unstable state of world affairs causes grave concern. We face, among many examples, the cruel extinction of the faint rays of hope for the Polish people, the continued Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, the Communist-sponsored and supported insurrection in El Salvador, the escalation of violence in Guatemala and Honduras, and the general turmoil that persists in the Middle East.

We see cowardly assaults upon our diplomatic and military personnel abroad. Our Nation, its leaders, and its policies are criticized and calumnized not only by those dedicated to our destruction but also by some of our allies and many of those other nations who should be our friends and supporters. The paucity of productive international discourse and discussion, the acceptance and promotion of calculated aggression instead of responsible and responsive diplomacy, the use of violence as a substitute for the orderly process of government, represent a direct challenge to the United States, to our allies, and to all who cherish the ideals of self-determination, human rights, and individual liberty.

As the leader and exemplar of the Free World, the United States must play a central role in preserving peace and restoring global stability. But, as a constant requisite, understand how our own system works and put our own house in order.

Our system works best when it is allowed to function the way it was designed: With checks and balances, a separation of powers. The President and his foreign policy team must take the lead in formulating and implementing our policy. The Congress has the responsibility to provide the President with the means to insure our national security and to conduct an effective diplomacy.

We in the Congress must understand our constitutionally mandated role in the Nation's foreign and defense policies. I believe this is a precondition for the restoration of the ability of the United States to preserve our vital interest, to act as a reliable security partner promoting the vital interests of our allies, and to serve as a reliable force for peace throughout the world.

The Constitution explicity assigns to the executive branch the responsibility for making and implementing policy. It is the mandate of Congress to provide the essential tools and support, including funds, advice, counsel, and timely oversight. This does not preclude a congressional role in the formulation of policy, but that role must be exercised in conjunction and cooperation with, and only rarely in competition with or opposition to, the initiatives and objectives of the executive branch.

The pressing need for the Congress to recognize and fulfill its proper role has been compellingly presented by the distinguished chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, the senior Senator from Texas. In his article, "Congress Versus the President: The Formulation and Implementation of American Foreign Policy," published in the winter issue of Foreign Affairs, Senator TOWER described the critical problems caused by the tendency of Congress to upset the separation of powers and to assume the prerogatives of the Executive in determining policy.

I believe that Senator TOWER is correct in his assertion that congressional arrogation of the constitutional prerogatives of the Executive has impaired the responsible and effective conduct of policy, and therefore the state of our national security.

Mr. President, I strongly commend to my colleagues the article by Senator TOWER. The need for us to understand what is at issue, to act wisely and responsibly, is painfully evident. As Senator TOWER lucidly says,

> These are not just debating points for historians and constitutional lawyers, but critical issues which need to be addressed if we are to see the successful exercise of American diplomacy in the 1980's.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of Senator TOWER's article be printed in the RECORD.

CONGRESS VERSUS THE PRESIDENT: THE FORMULATION AND IMPLEMENTATION OF AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

(By John G. Tower)

(The President is the sole organ of the nation in its external relations, and its sole representative with foreign nations.—John Marshall, March 7, 1800, 6th Congress)

One of the oldest conflicts in the American system of government is that between Congress and the President over the right to formulate and implement foreign policy. Is the President solely responsible for the conduct of external relations? Is the Congress an equal partner? Or does Congress have the right to shape U.S. policy by enacting legislation which proscribes a President's flexibility? These are not just debating points for historians and constitutional lawyers, but critical issues which need to be addressed if we are to see the successful exercise of American diplomacy in the 1980s. Our effectiveness in dealing with the problems ahead, especially U.S.-Soviet competition in the Third World, will depend to a significant degree on our ability to resolve the adversary relationship between the President and Congress.

The struggle for control of foreign policy came to the fore in the twentieth century, with America's reluctant entry into world affairs, two World Wars, and a smaller, but more complex, postwar bipolar world characterized by the increasing interdependence of nations. The first significant Congressional challenge to the Executive's foreign policy prerogative occurred during the interwar years. After the Senate rejected President Wilson's Versailles Treaty in 1920, Congress continued to assert itself in the formulation of foreign policy. By the 1930s, a strong Congress was able to prevent presidential initiative in the critical prewar years. The almost universal consensus today is that this Congressional intrusion had been a disaster and had inhibited the United States from playing a useful role in Europe that might have prevented World War II.

Following the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor and our entry into the Second World War, Congress and the President stood in agreement over the direction of American foreign and military policy. Congressional intervention all but ceased.

The post-World War II period was marked by a reasonable balance between Congress and the President in the foreign policy decision-making process. In fact, Presidential foreign policy intiatives were generally accepted and reinforced by bipartisan support on Capitol Hill. American foreign policy was fairly coherent and consistent through changing complexions of the body politic. The United States was perceived as a reliable ally and its leadership generally accepted with a high degree of confidence by the non-communist world. But the relative stability between Congress and the President began to erode in the early 1970s with Congressional disenchantment over the Vietnam War. By mid-decade the two branches were locked in a struggle for control of American foreign policy. To a certain extent Congress won, and the balance between Congress and the President has swung dangerously to the legislative side with unfavorable consequences for American foreign policy.

If the balance is not soon restored, American foreign policy will be unable to meet the critical challenges of the 1980s. We are entering an era of fast change and increasing volatility in world affairs. Political instability and regional conflict are on the rise, especially in the Third World. Developing nations in many parts of the world are being torn apart by civil wars between pro-West and Soviet-supported factions, subverted by externally supported insurrection, or subjected to radical or reactionary anti-Western pressures. The industrialized economies of the West are ever more dependent on a lifeline of resources from an increasingly vulnerable part of the world. The Soviet Union has pursued an aggressive interventionist policy on its periphery and abroad, supported by its emerging global force projection capability and its successful use of less direct means of projecting power.

We may well be in a situation today which is analogous to that of the late 1930s, when America's inability to play a more active role in world affairs helped permit the Axis to realize its objectives without serious challenge. During this period Congress tied the President's hands, with disastrous consequences. Now we are back in the same situation, and risk making the same mistakes. If the United States is prevented from playing an active role in countering Soviet and Soviet proxy involvement in the Third World, the 1990s could well find a world in which the resource-rich and strategically important developing nations are aligned with the Soviet Union.

II

What is the proper balance between Congress and the President in the formulation and implementation of foreign policy? Although the bulk of opinion argues for strong Executive authority in the conduct of external relations, the Constitution itself offers no clear definition as to where legislative authority ends and Presidential prerogative begins. The Constitution would appear to have vested war powers in both the Executive and Legislative branches. Although it conferred the power to declare war and raise and support the armed forces on Congress (Article I, Section 8), the Constitution also made the President Commander-in-Chief of the armed forces (Article II, Section 2). Nowhere in the Constitution is there unambiguous guidance as to which branch of government has the final authority to conduct external relations. Nonetheless, there is the strong implication that the formulation and implementation of foreign policy is a function of the Executive Branch, both as a practical necessity and as an essential concomitant of nationality.

John Jay argues this point in the Federalist Papers (Number 64, March 5, 1788):

"The loss of a battle, the death of a Prince, the removal of a minister, or other circumstances intervening to change the present posture and aspect of affairs, may turn the most favorable tide into a course opposite to our wishes. As in the field, so in the cabinet, there are moments to be seized as they pass, and they who preside in either, should be left in capacity to improve them. So often and so essentially have we heretofore suffered from the want of secrecy and dispatch, that the Constitution would have been inexcusably defective if no attention had been paid to those objects. Those matters which in negotiations usually require the most secrecy and the most dispatch, are those preparatory and auxiliary measures which are not otherwise important in a national view, than as they tend to facilitate the attainment of the objects of the negotiation. For these the president will find no difficulty to provide, and should any circumstance occur which requires the advice and consent of the senate, he may at any time convene them."

The Supreme Court has forcefully upheld Executive authority in foreign relations. In 1935 Justice Sutherland, in the case of U.S. v. Curtis-Wright Export Corporation et al. (299 U.S. 304), cited a series of previous Court decisions in arguing that the powers of "internal sovereignty" lay with the individual states, but those of "external sovereignty" were with the national government.

"[There are fundamental differences] between the powers of the federal government in respect to foreign or external affairs and those in respect to domestic or internal affairs . . . . Not only . . . is the federal power over external affairs in original and essential character different from that over internal affairs, but participation in the exercise of the power is significantly limited. In this vast external realm, with its important, complicated, delicate and manifold problems, the President alone has the power to speak or listen as a representative of the nation. He makes treaties with the advice and consent of the Senate; but he alone negotiates. Into the field of negotiation the Senate cannot intrude; and Congress itself is powerless to invade it.

It is quite apparent that if, in the maintenance of our international relations, embarrassment—perhaps serious embarrassment—is to be avoided and success for our aims achieved, congressional legislation which is to be made effective through negotiation and inquiry within the international field must often accord to the President a degree of discretion and freedom from statutory restriction which would not be admissible were domestic affairs alone involved."

In addition to the constitutional, judicial and historical arguments against Congressional intervention in foreign policy, there is an even more clear-cut issue of the efficacy of Congressional involvement in foreign policy. To the extent that Congress often represents competing regional and parochial interests, it is almost impossible for it to forge a unified national foreign policy strategy and to speak with one voice in negotiating with foreign powers. Because of the nature of the legislative process a law may be passed in response to a certain set of events, yet remain in effect long after the circumstances have changed. The great danger of Congressional intervention in foreign affairs is that enacted legislation becomes an institutional rigid "solution" to a temporary problem.

The President, along with the Vice President, is the only officer of government who is elected by and responsible to the nation as a whole. As such, only he possesses a national mandate. As head of the Executive Branch, the President can formulate a unified foreign policy, taking into consideration how each aspect of it will fit into an overall strategy. He and his advisers can formulate their strategy with the necessary confidentiality not only among themselves, but between the United States and foreign powers. The President has the information, professional personnel, operational experience, and national mandate to conduct a consistent long-range policy.

The legislative body, on the other hand, is elected to represent separate constituencies. Congress must of necessity take a tactical approach when enacting legislation, since the passage of laws is achieved by constantly shifting coalitions. This serves us well in the formulation of domestic policy, where we proceed by voting on one discrete piece of legislation at a time. Although many of us may have our own long-term strategies in mind as we vote on specific legislative matters, the overall effect is a body of legislation passed piece by piece by a changing majority of legislators. We build domestic policy one step at a time to the end that the final product of domestic legislation is reflected in a consensus of various coalitions. If we later find out we have made an error in a specific piece of domestic legisiation, we can change it. For example, if we determine that we have underfunded housing subsidies we can increase them the next year. But the process by which generally accepted domestic policy is arrived at does not lend itself to the formulation of a long-term, coherent, foreign policy. Once we alienate a friendly government, perhaps through shortsighted legislation, it may take years for us to rebuild that relationship and recoup the loss.

A foreign policy should be an aggregate strategy, made up of separate bilateral and multilateral relationships that fit into a grander scheme designed to promote the long-term national interests. With a comprehensive design in mind, those who execute foreign policy can respond to changes in the international environmental, substituting one tactic for another as it becomes necessary, but retaining the overall strategy.

In 1816, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee put the argument this way:

"The President is the constitutional representative of the United States with regard to foreign nations. He manages our concerns with foreign nations and must necessarily be most competent to determine when, how, and upon what subjects negotiation may be urged with the greatest prospect of success. . . . The Committee . . . think the interference of the Senate in the direction of foreign negotiations are calculated to diminish that responsibility and thereby to impair the best security for the national safety. The nature of transactions with foreign nations, moreover, requires caution and unity of design, and their success frequently depends on secrecy and dispatch."

Five hundred and thirty-five Congressmen with different philosophies, regional interest and objectives in mind cannot forge a unified foreign policy that reflects the interests of the United States as a whole. Nor can they negotiate with foreign powers, or meet the requirement for diplomatic confidentiality. They are also ill equipped to respond quickly and decisively to changes in the international scene. The shifting coalitions of Congress, which serve us so well in the formulation and implementation of domestic policy, are not well suited to the day-to-day conduct of external relations. An observer has compared the conduct of foreign relations to a geopolitical chess game. Chess is not a team sport.

III

The 1970s were marked by a rash of Congressionally initiated foreign policy legislation that limited the President's range of options on a number of foreign policy issues. The thrust of the legislation was to restrict the President's ability to dispatch troops abroad in a crisis, and to proscribe his authority in arms sales, trade, human rights, foreign assistance and intelligence operations. During this period, over 150 separate prohibitions and restrictions were enacted on Executive Branch authority to formulate and implement foreign policy. Not only was much of this legislation ill conceived, if not actually unconstitutional, it has served in a number of instances to be detrimental to the national security and foreign policy interests of the United States.

The President's freedom of action in building bilateral relationships was severely proscribed by the series of Nelson-Bingham Amendments, beginning with the 1974 Foreign Assistance Act (P.L. 93-559). This legislation required the President to give advance notice to Congress of any offer to sell to foreign countries defense articles and services valued at $25 million or more and empowered the Congress to disapprove such sales within 20 calendar days by concurrent resolution. In 1976, the Nelson-Bingham Amendment to the Arms Export Control Act (P.L. 94-329) tightened these restrictions to include advance notification of any sale of "major" defense equipment totaling over $7 million. Congress is now given 30 days in which to exercise its legislative veto.

The consequence of these laws is that for the past seven years every major arms sale agreement has been played out amidst an acrimonious national debate, blown out of all proportion to the intrinsic importance of the transaction in question. Often the merits of the sale and its long-term foreign policy consequences are ignored, since legislators are put into the position of posturing for domestic political considerations. The debate diverts the President, the Congress and the nation from focusing on vital internal matters. Finally, because arms sales debates command such much media attention, legislators are inclined to give the impulsive reaction statements before they have an opportunity for informed deliberation. They thereby often commit themselves to positions that, on cool reflection, they find untenable but difficult to recant.

The recent debate over the sale of AWACS (Airborne Warning and Control System) surveillance aircraft to Saudi Arabia is a classic case in point. Under such circumstances, it becomes extremely difficult for elected legislators to ignore constituent pressures and decide an issue on its merits. For example, Congressman Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.) said following the House vote to reject the AWACS sale that he voted against selling AWACS to Saudi Arabia for political reasons, despite his view that the sale should go through on its merits.

Such a situation raises the possibility that should the Congressional decision do ultimate violence to our national interest, the nation whose perceived interests have been sustained by successful lobbying will pay a price later. My colleague, Senator William Cohen (R-Maine), who opposed the sale on its merits, felt compelled to vote for it because he feared its defeat would precipitate an American backlash against Israel:

"If the sale is rejected, [Israel] . . . will be blamed for the dissolution of the peace process . . . when the crisis comes . . . when everyone is pointing an accusatory finger looking for a scapegoat, I do not want to hear any voices in the United States say—if only they had not been so intransigent, if only they had agreed not to interfere, if only they had not brought this mess—this death—upon themselves."

In some cases Congress allows a sale to go through, but only after a series of trivial and humiliating restrictions are placed on the purchasing nation. This tends to negate whatever goodwill the sale was designed to achieve. For example, in 1975 the President agreed to sell HAWK surface-to-air mobile missiles to Jordan. After a national brouhaha filled with many insults to King Hussein and questions about the stability of his regime, the sale finally went through, but only in "compromise" form—we took the wheels off. Presumably, HAWK missiles without wheels would allow the Jordanians to use them in fixed positions to protect the capital and key military locations, but prevent them from moving the missiles to the front line to be used against Israel. King Hussein later asked then Secretary of State Henry Kissinger why Congress had insisted on such a trivial point. It was never a question of whether the HAWKS would be mobile or not—we knew the Jordanians would be able to buy the wheels on the international market if they decided to violate the terms of the sale. The end result was that rather than cement our friendly relations with Jordan, we succeeded in humiliating a longtime friend.

Such actions are not soon forgotten. In his recent visit to Washington, King Hussein indicated that Jordan is considering turning to the Soviet Union for its new air defense missiles. This attitude clearly stems in part from his unhappiness over Congressional restrictions on U.S. arms sales to Jordan. According to a State Department spokesman, the 1975 HAWK missile sale "still rankles" in Jordan.

The Turkish Arms Embargo was a case where Congress tied the President's hands in negotiations. After the Turkish invasion of Cyprus on July 19-20, 1974, the Administration became involved in negotiations aimed at reconciling our two NATO allies, Greece and Turkey. After two days, a cease-fire was achieved, with Turkey controlling 25 percent of Cyprus.

Yet Congress was moving on a path of its own. On August 2, the House introduced two measures demanding the immediate and total removal of Turkish troops from Cyprus. After the second Turkish assault on August 14, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee prompted a State Department inquiry into possible Turkish violations of U.S. arms restrictions.

At one point, Prime Minister Ecevit of Turkey privately communicated his willingness to settle on terms representing a significant improvement over the status quo. The Administration was concerned that Congressional action would make it harder for Turkey to follow a conciliatory policy and thus destroy any hopes of a negotiated settlement. In an attempt to discourage a Turkish embargo, the White House invited several of my colleagues to attend briefings on the possibility of negotiations. Even after being shown evidence that a negotiation likely to improve Greece's position was in the making, these Congressmen continued to call for an arms embargo; soon, all hopes for a negotiated settlement vanished. On September 16, Ecevit's moderate government collapsed, and on October 17, the Congress imposed a Turkish arms embargo on a "very, very reluctant" President Ford. The embargo began on February 5, 1975; by that time, Turkey controlled 40 percent of the island. On June 17, 1975, Turkey responded to the embargo by placing all U.S. bases and listening posts on provisional status. On July 24, 1975, the House rejected a motion to partially lift the embargo; two days later, Turkey announced it was shutting down all U.S. bases and posts on its territory.

Thus, instead of reaching an agreement with a moderate Turkish government that controlled one-quarter of Cyprus, the United States had severely strained relations with an angry Turkish government that controlled two-fifths of the island. Furthermore, the aid cutoff weakened Turkey militarily, jeopardizing the southern flank of NATO and putting at risk our strategic listening posts in that country.

In a society such as ours, with its heterogeneous mix of various national and ethnic groups, strong lobbies are inevitable. But to submit American foreign policy to inordinate influence by these groups—often emotionally charged—is to impair a President's ability to carry out a strategy which reflects the interests of our nation as a whole. The Nelson-Bingham Amendments and the Turkisk Arms Embargo were two pieces of legislation conducive to such a situation.

A second major area where Congressional intervention contributed to foreign policy disasters was the series of anti-war amendments. Throughout the early 1970s Congress proposed a series of acts aimed at forcing the United States into early withdrawal from Southeast Asia and cutting off American aid to Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia. The Cooper-Church Amendment, which became law in early 1971, cut off funds for U.S. troops, advisers and air support in and over Cambodia. The Eagleton Amendment (1973) called for American withdrawal from Laos and Cambodia. The McGovern-Hatfield Amendment (1970-71) set deadlines for American withdrawal from Indochina. Even though these two latter anti-Vietnam amendments did not become law, the pattern was clear by the early 1970s. My Senate colleagues would introduce one amendment after another, making it clear to the North Vietnamese that we would eventually legislate ourselves out of Vietnam. The Administration lost both credibility and flexibility in the peace negotiations. By making it clear to the North Vietnamese that Congress would prevent the President from further pursuing the war, or from enforcing the eventual peace, Congress sent a clear signal to our enemies that they could win in the end. The North Vietnamese were encouraged to stall in the Paris Peace Talks, waiting for American domestic dissent to provide them with the victory their military forces had been unable to achieve. After the Paris Agreements, aid to South Vietnam was throttled.

Finally, on July 1, 1973, we destroyed any hope of enforcing the Paris Peace Accords. The Fulbright Amendment to the Second Supplemental Appropriations Act for fiscal year 1973 prohibited the use of funds "to support directly or indirectly combat activities in . . . or over Cambodia, Laos, North Vietnam and South Vietnam." As I said in Congressional debate over the Eagleton Amendment, the forerunner to the Fulbright Amendment:

"It has tremendous significance because it marks the placing on the President of an . . . inhibition in the conduct of foreign relations, in the negotiating of agreement and treaties, and in the implementation and enforcement of those agreements once arrived at. . . . What we have in effect done in the Eagleton Amendment is said to [the North Vietnamese]: 'You may do whatever you please. Having concluded this agreement, we intend to walk away from it, and we don't care whether you violate those provisions or not.'"

I believed then and still believe that our failure to enforce the Paris Accords was a principal contributor to Communist victory in Indochina and the resulting horrors we have seen since in Laos, Cambodia and Vietnam. Reasonable men may argue whether or not we were right in being in Vietnam in the first place. I remain convinced that we made many mistakes that led us there, and that our direct involvement was ill conceived. But to deny a President the military means to enforce a negotiated agreement guaranteed that all the sacrifices that came before it would be in vain. Just because a peace agreement is signed or a cease-fire agreed to is no guarantee that both sides will live up to it. After World War II we enforced the peace with Germany and Japan by occupation forces. We guaranteed the Korean cease-fire by the continued presence of U.N. troops at the Demilitarized Zone. The Fulbright Amendment prohibited our enforcing the Paris Accords. We bought a settlement in Vietnam with 50,000 American lives that gave South Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos a chance to survive—a chance that was thrown away when we refused to be guarantors to that settlement.

The War Powers Act (P.L. 93-148) is probably the most potentially damaging of the 1970s legislation, although we have yet to experience a crisis where its effects are felt. The War Powers Act (1973) grew out of Congress' frustration with the war in Vietnam and its desire to prevent such a situation from ever happening again. Although President Nixon vetoed the Act on October 24, 1973, terming it "unconstitutional," his veto was overriden two weeks later by the House and Senate.

The act provides that before American troops are introduced "into hostilities or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances" the President is to consult with Congress "in every possible instance." The President must notify Congress and submit a report within 48 hours after armed forces are sent abroad, "setting forth the circumstances necessitating the introduction of U.S. forces" and the "estimated scope and duration of the hostilities or involvement." After this initial two-day period, the President has 60 days to withdraw those forces or receive Congressional authorization for an extension, or a declaration of war.

This act jeopardizes the President's ability to respond quickly, forcefully and if necessary in secret, to protect American interests abroad. This may even invite crises. Although the act does not specify whether the report to Congress must be unclassified, there remains the possibility that a confidential report would become public knowledge. In many cases the more urgent the requirement that a decision remain confidential, the greater the pressures for disclosure. Thus, by notifying Congress of the size, disposition and objectives of U.S. forces dispatched in a crisis, we run the risk that the report may get into the public domain. If this information becomes available to the enemy, he then knows exactly what he can expect from American forces and thus what risks he runs in countering American actions. This removes any element of surprise the U.S. forces might have enjoyed and eliminates any uncertainties the adversary might have as to American plans.

It is interesting to speculate on just how damaging the legislation could prove to be at some future point. For that matter, what if the Iranian rescue attempt had gone somewhat differently? On April 26, 1980, President Carter reported to Congress the use of armed forces in the unsuccessful attempt to rescue American hostages in Iran on April 24, in full compliance with the 48-hour notification requirement of the War Powers Act. In this case, the rescue operation was over by the time the report was submitted, so there was no longer a need for secrecy nor a need for Congress to consider whether forces should be authorized or withdrawn. But what if the rescue attempt had bogged down or been planned as a longer effort? No doubt the details would have gotten out almost immediately, leaving little doubt in the minds of the Iranians just what the Americans were up to. While the framers of the War Powers Act intended it to prevent another Vietnam, their legislation has the effect of severely limiting the President's ability to respond quickly, forcefully and in secret to a foreign crisis.

In addition to the questionable wisdom of the reporting and consulting requirements of the War Powers Act, there are also doubts as to whether the legislative veto contained in the act is constitutional. Section 5 of the Act allows Congress the right to terminate any use of force, at any time, that has not been specifically authorized by either a declaration of war or similar legislation, by a concurrent resolution passed by a simple majority of both Houses. The legislative veto contained in the War Powers Act would appear to be in violation of Article 1, Section 7 of the Constitution. This so-called presentation clause clearly stipulates that an act can become law only if it is passed by a majority of both Houses of Congress followed by the President's assent, or by a two-thirds vote in each Chamber to override the President's veto.

After the Indochina debacle, there was a raft of Vietnam-syndrome legislation that sought to prevent the President from getting us involved in "future Vietnams." The Tunney Amendment to the Defense Appropriations Act of 1976 (P.L. 94-212), which passed the Senate on December 19, 1975, prohibited the use of "funds appropriated in this Act for any activities involving Angola other than intelligence gathering."[1] My colleagues feared that President Ford's attempts to offer minimal assistance to the pro-West UNITA (National Union for the Total Independence of Angola) and FNLA (National Front for the Liberation of Angola) factions would somehow embroil us in "another Vietnam." The domestic debate over whether we should become involved in Angola sent a clear signal to the Soviets and their Cuban proxies. They knew that the risk of U.S. intervention was low, and the possibility of continued U.S. assistance to the pro-Western factions slim.

Although the Soviet-Cuban airlift halted temporarily in December with President Ford's stern warning to the Soviet Ambassador, the airlift resumed with a vengeance following passage of the Tunney Amendment on December 19, 1975. The number of Cubans in Angola doubled as they began flying in fresher troops for what was to become an all-out offensive against pro-Western forces. By January the Soviet Union had increased its military assistance to the MPLA (Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola) and stationed Soviet warships in the vicinity of Angola. They began extensive ferrying operations for Cuban troops. It was clear that the United States had lost whatever leverage it might have had to persuade Soviet leaders to reduce Soviet and Cuban involvement in Angola.

With Angola the Soviet Union entered a new phase; never before had it or its surrogate Cuban army attempted such large-scale operations in Africa or anywhere else in the Third World. Their successful intervention in Angola bestowed on the Soviet Union and Cuba the image of dependable allies and supporters of radical movements in southern Africa. The United States by contrast was portrayed as having lost its taste for foreign involvement after Vietnam, and as being domestically divided over a foreign policy strategy. The moderate black African states lost confidence in America's willingness to stem the tide of Soviet involvement in the region.

After being reduced to sporadic guerrilla engagements for over a year, in July 1977 the pro-West UNITA faction declared its intention to renew the fight. Following this announcement, the Soviets and Cubans increased their efforts. As of late 1979, there were some 19,000 Cuban troops, 6,000 Cuban civilian technicians and 400 to 500 Soviet advisors in Angola. Although the guerrilla war continues, the Clark Amendment prohibits the United States from offering any aid to the pro-Western faction. The Clark Amendment prevents us from responding to Soviet and Cuban involvement in Angola, and leaves open to them the mineral-rich, strategically important region of southern Africa.

Finally, two of the most damaging Congressional intrusions into national security policy were the Senate Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities (the so-called Church Committee) and the Hughes-Ryan Amendment to the Foreign Assistance Act (P.L. 93-189). As vice-chairman of the Church Committee (1975-76) I sought to limit the damage to our intelligence community, although to little avail. By conducting a public inquiry into the CIA we exposed not only its supposed blunders and malfeasance but also important information as to how the CIA is organized, how it gathers intelligence and what kinds of sources and methods it uses.

The Hughes-Ryan Amendment, which became law on December 30, 1974, prohibited any CIA activities abroad that are not directly related to intelligence gathering, "unless and until the President finds that each such operation is important to the national security of the United States and reports, in a timely fashion, a description and scope of such operations to the appropriate committees of Congress." By 1977 information about covert intelligence activities was available to eight Congressional committees, for a total of 200 members or roughly 40 percent of Congress.[2]

This, plus the Church Committee hearings, confirmed to our adversaries that clandestine operations would be severely curtailed in the future. It sent a signal to our adversaries that they could proceed with impunity in the "back alleys of the world." These actions also shook the confidence of those friendly states which had cooperated with us in intelligence gathering, and caused many of them to reassess their relationship with the U.S. intelligence community. They feared Congressional investigations of the CIA would expose their own intelligence sources and methods. In private conversations with officials of freindly intelligence agencies, I have been told that the Church Committee raised doubts about the wisdom of their cooperating with the United States in the future. This has also adversely affected our cooperation with countries that for political reasons take a publicly hostile attitude toward the United States, but who privately cooperate with us on some matters of mutual interest. They fear the publicity generated by a Congressional investigation would expose what is essentially a private relationship, and lead to unfavorable domestic political consequences for them. Finally, either through leaks or publicly released date, the Church Committee titillated the press with daily helpings of some of our nation's most treasured secrets.

IV

If we are to meet the foreign policy challenges facing us in the 1980s, we must restore the traditional balance between Congress and the President in the formulation and implementation of foreign policy. To do so, much of the legislation of the past decade should be repealed or amended.

Many in congress are coming to this conclusion and are working toward a reversal of the imbalance. The 1980 modification of the Hughes-Ryan Amendment to require notification of covert actions to only the two Intelligence Committees is one such step, as in the Senate's October 22, 1981, vote to repeal the Clark Amendment. Further efforts in this direction are essential if we are to have the maximum flexibility required to respond to a fast-changing world.

In addition to reversing much of this legislation, we should also look at new legislation which may be appropriate. There are strong arguments in favor of creating an unspecified contingency fund for economic and military assistance. One of the consequences of the 1970s, legislation was that such funds which had previously existed were either abolished or severely curtailed. Reestablishment of such funds would grant the President the flexibility he needs to be able to respond quickly to help new friends that emerge unexpectedly, or old friends who are suddenly endangered. While disbursement of these funds should be made with appropirate notification to Congress, the inevitable delays involved in waiting for new Congressional authorization should be avoided.

For example, when Zimbabwe became independent on April 18, 1980, the new government was strongly anti-Soviet, pro-West and in need of economic assistance. On the day he took office, President Mugabe invited the United States to be the first nation to establish diplomatic relations with and open an embassy in Zimbabwe. We responded with a pledge of economic assistance, but due to the lack of funds for such contingencies, were able to grant only $2 million. We had to wait almost ten months, until the next appropriations cycle could be completed, to grant Zimbabwe the amount of economic assistance it needed.

We face a similar situation in northern Africa today. In the confusion cast over the area in the wake of the Sadat assassination, Libyan President Qadhafi has heightened threats against the anti-Soviet government of Sudan. The Libyan army appears to be on an alerted posture. Were Libya to attack Sudan tomorrow, there is very little the United States could do right away to assist President Nimeiry.

As legislation now stands the President has certain limited flexibility to grant military assistance to respond quickly to un-

[1] The Clark Amendment to the Arms Export Control Act of 1976 (Sec. 404, P.L. 94-329), which became law on June 30, 1976, further tightened the restriction by prohibiting "assistance of any kind . . . for the purpose, or which would have the effect, of promoting or augmenting, directly or indirectly, the capacity of any nation, group, organization, movement, or individual to conduct military or paramilitary operations in Angola."

[2] In one of the few reversals of the 1970s legislation, in October 1980 the President signed into law an amendment to the National Security Act (P.L. 96-450), which stipulates that he must report covert operations to only two Congressional Committees, the House and Senate Select Committees on Intelligence.

planned situations. The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended, permits the President, in the interests of national security, to draw on U.S. military stocks, defense services, or military education and training, up to $50 million in any fiscal year for foreign use. In 1981 the Reagan Administration requested that new contingency funds totalling $350 million be established for emergency economic and military assistance. As of mid-November 1981 Congressional action on this request is still pending, although it appears that both Houses are moving to reduce significantly the size of these contingency funds.

In supporting such discretionary authority and appropriations, and urging the repeal of the excessively restrictive legislation of the 1970s, I am in effect proposing a return to the situation that prevailed in the 1950s and 1960s.

At that time the Congress did provide discretionary authority and substantial contingency funds for the use of Presidents Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson. Each of these Presidents employed his authority to act quickly and decisively in ways which, on balance, served the national interest—especially in new and unforeseen situations emerging in what we now call the Third World. The basic authority of the Congress to appropriate funds for the armed forces and foreign activities remained constant. Indeed, the Congress from time to time expressed its views forcefully as to the desirablility of support for nations that acted in ways prejudical to American interests. (An early example of such legislation was the Hickenlooper Amendment, which for many years expressed Congress' general opposition to continue aid to countries that nationalized private American companies without adequate compensation.) The crucial difference is that such expressions of Congressional sentiment almost invariably contained a saving clause that permitted the President to go ahead if he certified to the Congress that the action was necessary for overriding national security reasons. This is a perfectly sound and reasonable practice, and one that avoids the immense complications and possible unconstitutionality of the legislative vetoes introduced by the various amendments of the 1970's.

In short, what I propose above is vastly more effective than the present situation, sounder from every constitutional standpoint, and fully in keeping with past precedents.

V

Finally, in reconsidering the legislation of the 1970's, it is useful to reexamine it and its causes in a more dispassionate light than that of the period. At the time, much of this legislation was considered a necessary response to counter the excesses of the presidency. Since the Vietnam War had never been formally declared by Congress, it was seen as the President's war. Watergate along with the war, was considered to be the result of a Presidency grown to authoritarian. If the war were even to end, and if future Vietnams were to be prevented, the President's foreign policy authority would have to be proscribed. As Arthur Schlesinger put it, the theory "that a foreign policy must be trusted to the executive went down in flames in Vietnam. . . .Vietnam discredited executive control of foreign relations as profoundly as Versailles and mandatory neutrality had discredited congressional control."[3]

If this legislation was motivated by an "Imperial Presidency," whose ultimate manifestation was an undeclared war, then the motivation is flawed. Blame for Vietnam can be laid at many doors: a series of American Presidents, and those in the civilian leadership who advocated gradual escalation and limited rules of engagement. But Congress was not blameless. The war in Vietnam, while undeclared by Congress in a formal sense, had de facto Congressional support. Beginning in the mid-1960s the Administration sent defense authorization and appropriations bills to Congress—legislation which clearly designated certain men and monies for the war effort. Year after year Congress acquiesced in the Vietnam War, by authorizing and appropriating resources for it. As former Senator J. William Fulbright remarked, "It was not a lack of power which prevented the Congress from ending the war in Indochina but a lack of will." With waning public support for a war which seemed to drag on forever, many in Congress and the media looked to a single explanation—for a scapegoat who could be held accountable for an unpopular war. Blame for the war in Vietnam was attributed to the usurpation of power by the President.

In the early 1970s Congress reversed itself and belatedly attempted to use its appropriation authority to end the war. While this was certainly within its prerogative, the timing was of questionable wisdom. Our efforts to disengage from Vietnam and to negotiate with the North Vietnamese were made more difficult by Congressional intervention. Congressional action made a settlement all the more difficult to achieve and, ultimately, impossible to enforce. The view that the Vietnam War discredited forever Executive control of foreign policy was an emotional reaction, driven by the passion of the moment. Because of it, Congress embarked on a course to limit not only President Nixon's flexibility, but also that of future Presidents. Congress prescribed a cure for a nonexistent disease. The lasting effect was that Congress institutionalized its foreign policy differences with the President by legislating permanent solutions for a temporary situation.

As Cyrus Vance said at the 1980 Harvard commencement, "Neither we nor the world can afford an American foreign policy which is hostage to the emotions of the moment." The authority to conduct external relations should not vacillate between Congress and the President as a result of failed or unpopular initiatives. The whole point of a written constitution and body of judicial opinion is to establish a consistent mechanism for apportioning authority. Whereas the Constitution confers on the Senate the duty of advice and consent in the making of treaties, on the Congress the power to appropriate monies for armed forces and to declare war, and special authority in the field of trade, it confers on Congress no other special rights in the field of external affairs.

The cumulative effect of this legislation is that, as the United States enters a period when the greatest flexibility is required of an American President to deal with fast-changing situations in the world, Congress has inhibited the President's freedom of action and denied him the tools necessary for the formulation and implementation of American foreign policy. We know that the Soviet Union maintains clandestine operations which are well organized, well disciplined, well financed, well trained and often well armed, in virtually every Third World country. They are in a position to exploit many restive political situations which they may or may not originate. To inhibit the United States in its ability to conduct covert operations, to provide military assistance to pro-West governments or groups, and to respond quickly to military crises is to concede an enormous advantage to the Soviet Union and its proxies.

It is my sincere hope that Congress will reexamine its role in the conduct of foreign policy and repeal or amend, as necessary, the legislation of the 1970's. The end toward which we should work is to do whatever is necessary to strengthen America's ability to formulate and implement a unified coherent and cohesive foreign policy to face the challenges of the 1980's.●

AGENCY PAPERWORK

● Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, back on October 6, I entered into the RECORD a list of agency officials charged with the responsibility of overseeing agency paperwork. If anyone has a complaint about the paperwork churned out by an agency, these are the people who should get the complaint. That list has now been updated. Surprisingly, it shows little attrition from October, which proves that bureaucrats may be made of tougher stuff than we sometimes give them credit for. In the interest of saving paper, I will not ask that the entire list be reprinted, but the additions and corrections follow:

THE PLIGHT OF SOVIET JEWRY

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, in 1948, the United Nations declared that all human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights; that everyone has the right to life, liberty, and security of person; that no one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention, or exile; that everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own, and to return to his country; and that everyone has the right of freedom of thought, conscience, and religion.

As an enlightened document, the U.N.'s human rights declaration has few equals. But for Jews living in the Soviet Union who have made known their desire to emigrate, that declaration has no basis in reality. They know neither freedom nor dignity, to the extent that those conditions are bestowed by society. They are subject to arbitrary arrest, detention, and internal exile. They know no freedom of movement. They are prisoners of conscience in a country that harasses them for practicing their faith. Yet, they are denied the right to emigrate to a country like Israel where members of their family live and worship in freedom. Soviet Jews are not only a people without human rights; they are a people without a country.

Eleven years after the Soviet Union opened the door to emigration ever so slightly, that door appears ready to slam shut. Emigration is at its lowest point since 1970. According to the most recent estimates, 1981 emigration fell below 10,000, a dramatic drop from the 1979 figure of 51,300.

For this reason, I recently wrote to Secretary of State Haig to express my concern over this matter.

The letter follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., January 19, 1982.

Secretary ALEXANDER M. HAIG,
Department of State,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In anticipation of your scheduled meeting with Soviet Foreign Minister Gromyko in Geneva on January 25 and 26, I want to urge you to raise the issue of Jewish emigration from the Soviet Union as part of those high level discussions.

As I know you are well aware, emigration permitted by the Soviets has dropped off precipitously over the last several years. From its high of 51,300 persons in 1979, emigration fell to 21,700 in 1980 and below 10,000 in 1981. These figures indicate a clear and deliberate policy of restricting departures from the Soviet Union. Since the Soviets have subscribed to the principle of freedom of movement of its citizens in both the Helsinki Accords and the Universal Declaration on Human Rights, this documented violation must not be ignored.

The traditions of the United States in defense of individual liberties require our special intervention on behalf of oppressed people everywhere. In the specific case of the Soviet Jews, we must avail ourselves of the opportunities which Soviet-U.S. relations provide. The Soviets have a significant stake in relations with the United States and the West, which provides a context for pursuing our demands for their freedom.

I would therefore respectfully request that you forcefully confront the Soviets regarding this matter and convey the deep and abiding concern of the American people for the welfare of Soviet Jewry.

With kind regards,

Sincerely,

LOWELL P. WEICKER, Jr.,
U.S. Senator.

Applications are being denied right and left while preconditions for applying are stiffening. Now included among those preconditions for emigration are parental permissions and affidavits from employers. The Soviet regime's so-called reasons for denying applications border on the ridiculous; 68-year-old Asya Belfer who lives in Kharkov was told she had insufficient kinship to her family members in Israel to be able to join them. Asya's son Efim and his family were allowed to emigrate to Israel in 1977 after it was discovered that he had leukemia. Asya applied to accompany them but permission was denied. Her son died in Israel and now Asya wants to go there and be with her daughter-in-law and grandchildren. Soviet authorities seem determined to keep Asya where she is.

What, I ask you, does this prove? Why should a nuclear superpower want to bully a perfectly harmless 68-year-old woman who only wants to leave? Does it feel threatened by her? Well, perhaps it should. Asya Belfer's faith and fortitude will never be crushed. It is a faith not just of one person but of an entire people.

And what about young Nandor Berger. Berger was denied permission to emigrate supposedly because he served in the military from 1972 to 1974. This excuse is frequently employed by the Soviet authorities on the theory that anyone who served in the army would have been exposed to and could compromise state secrets. Of course, this is simply not true of most Red army veterans. Nandor Berger spent his stint in the service as a guard in a food storehouse. In addition, most of the other veterans wishing to emigrate have been out of uniform for so many years that what little knowledge they might have gleaned on duty would be obsolete by now.

The repression is worse for those who wish to emigrate. The very act of applying is tantamount to giving up all prestige and privileges hitherto earned and enjoyed. Most would-be emigres lose their jobs and are denied admission to universities. To an even greater extent than other Soviet citizens, their actions and their associations are spied on, reported on and disrupted. After Vladimir Feltsman applied in 1979 to emigrate to Israel, this critically acclaimed young pianist had his concerts canceled and his tapes and records removed from Soviet stores and erased. Because of this official policy of persecution, the country as a whole suffers the loss of some of its best doctors, engineers, and artists.

As if all of this were not bad enough, the Soviet Union's crackdown on emigration has been coupled with a rise in official anti-Semitism and a spate of new arrests. The official press condemns Zionism as the worst enemy of mankind and the poisoned weapon of imperialism. Red army officers and draftees are being shown films that were, until recently, banned because authorities feared they might lead to pogroms.

Hebrew remains the only national language forbidden to be taught in the Soviet Union. Hebrew teachers in Moscow have been told in no uncertain terms that they must stop holding unofficial classes or face arrest.

Soviet police are already raiding seminars on Jewish culture—even those primarily related, as were Victor Brailovsky's to scientific endeavor—and rounding up participants. Phony trials frequently follow with the defendants effectively denied the services of an attorney.

And so we see a prominent cyberneticist like Brailvosky sentenced to 3 years and 3 months of internal exile. We see Vladimir Kislik sentenced to 3 years in a labor camp for leading a protest demonstration, something the Soviets call malicious hooliganism. And, just a few days ago, Alexander Paritsky, once a professor of ocean electronics at Kharkov Jewish University, was tried for slandering the Soviet State.

The fact is, ladies and gentlemen, that you know and I know that the people who are really slandering the Soviet State are the people in power, the people preventing free emigration, the people making arbitrary arrests. The repressive actions of the Soviet Government are the most damaging propaganda imaginable.

It is up to those of us in the free world to condemn those repressive actions. Any East-West dialog and certainly any détente must coexist with a tireless pursuit of human rights for Jews and other repressed peoples. Human rights always have been the heart of our foreign policy, when we were on course. The commitments our Founding Fathers made to the value and dignity of all human life have been affirmed and defended from Yorktown to Normandy to Selma, Ala.

When we ignore or bargain away those ideals for some specific diplomatic or economic advantage, we compromise our fundamental strength. We are quite rightfully concerned about the threat of nuclear war and arms control must, therefore, be a top priority. But neither can we afford to ignore the fact that the Soviet Union is, even as we speak, waging war on its own citizens.

Those of us who, in the words of the psalmist, would be watchmen for the morning, awaiting the dawn of human rights in the Soviet Union, must keep the home fires burning. Every citizen, every Member of Congress who stands up for human rights is a candle, lighting the way for those who live in darkness. That great Swede and now, I am proud to say, an honorary American, Raoul Wallenberg, was just such a candle. His light lives on even though his body may languish in a Soviet prison. Ida Nudel, guardian angel of Soviet prisoners of conscience, is such a candle, even though she has been condemned to life in Siberia.

From men and women such as these, we must take our cue, our inspiration. They refused to tolerate totalitarianism. So must we.●

in order on Calendar Wednesday of this week be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

THE HONORABLE BARBARA B. KENNELLY

(Mr. MOFFETT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MOFFETT. Mr. Speaker and colleagues, it is my pleasure today to introduce you to our newest Member, BARBARA KENNELLY of Hartford. She studied at Trinity College here in Washington, received a degree from Harvard Radcliffe in business administration, was a member of the city council back in Hartford, and served as our secretary of state.

Mrs. KENNELLY combines the best of our older political traditions with the best of our newer political traditions, and her election victory really reflected this fact.

□ 1245

Her father was the late John Bailey, not only the chairman of our party in Connecticut, but also the national chairman of the Democratic Party for the entire United States of America. We are, as a delegation on both sides of the aisle, I think I can say, looking forward to working with her, and we know that the Members will enjoy working with her as well.

THE HONORABLE BARBARA B. KENNELLY

(Mr. RATCHFORD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RATCHFORD. Mr. Speaker, I join the Connecticut delegation, the New England delegation, and indeed the people from throughout the Northeast in welcoming our newest Member.

For those Members who knew Bill Cotter, I can say without hesitation that she is a most worthy successor to our dear friend, Bill Cotter. She is progressive; she is thoughtful; she is people-oriented, and her whole life has been a life of public service.

Congressman MOFFETT mentioned the background; indeed, a distinguished one, service in the Court of Common Counsel in Hartford, where she was the top vote getter and a very people-oriented member of that body; reform-oriented in her service as secretary of state, continuing in the tradition of the beloved Ella Grasso, who served in that capacity before her; carrying on a great family tradition—not only a Bailey family tradition, but a Kennelly family tradition.

Indeed, to those who follow State politics, her husband, who is with us today, Jim Kennelly, served with me and followed me as a speaker of the Connecticut General Assembly.

We bring to the Members today someone who is right for the times; tough but compassionate; concerned with budgets but equally concerned with people; and above all, attuned to the problems of the 1980's. She comes from the First Congressional District of Connecticut. She is the first Member of Congress elected in 1982, and those of us who will serve with her from Connecticut are proud to welcome two great families who come together today to bring us the newest Member of the House of Representatives, BARBARA BAILEY KENNELLY of Connecticut. We welcome you.

THE HONORABLE BARBARA B. KENNELLY

(Mr. GEJDENSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, as my two colleagues have pointed out, BARBARA B. KENNELLY comes from a political tradition in Connecticut. On her father's side, our State party chairman for many years, and our national party chairman; her husband, Jim Kennelly, was my speaker in my two terms in the State house of representatives.

She has another tradition. She is the first woman to follow Ella Grasso, our beloved and deceased Governor, who set such a standard for women, and indeed all of us, in politics in Connecticut. Following Billy Cotter and Ella Grasso in this House is a very heavy responsibility, but we all know that she can do the job well, having served her constituency as a city councilor, as has been mentioned, and as secretary of state.

Her combination of personal skills and dedication to work hard will make her one of the outstanding Members of this Congress.

ADMINISTRATION PROGRAMS ARE NOT WORKING

(Mr. GORE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, it has been a long break, but unfortunately some things have not changed. The administration's economic game plan still is not working. Interest rates are still at ridiculously high levels and are going up again with devastating consequences. Unemployment is still going up and will soon approach the highest levels since the Great Depression. The stock market is still going down, reflecting the lack of confidence in the administration's grasp of economic reality.

Tens of thousands of small businesses and farming operations are going bankrupt. Auto dealers are going under, although Rolls-Royce sales are up 62 percent. The administration still believes in what its own budget director admits is trickle-down economics and still maintains a "steady as you go" policy.

But, Mr. Speaker, the economic circumstances facing our country are worse than this administration seems to realize. Its program is not working, and we must have changes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BROWN of California). The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

WILL THE CONGRESS HAVE THE GUTS TO SAY NO TO THE PRESIDENT?

(Mr. PEYSER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Speaker, based on the reports we have received today, the Congress and the country is going to be treated to more of the same tomorrow night when we are addressed by President Reagan. We will be told that to solve the problems of the country we must cut more money from education, from the elderly, from housing, and from the poor.

Nowhere in his talk is the President going to make any reference to the repeal of the unbelievable tax breaks we gave to the oil producers last year. Any increase in taxes that is going to be projected will affect only the middle-income and the lowmiddle-income families.

Mr. Speaker, are we going to have the courage to say no to the President this year? Are we going to have the guts in an election year to take back some of the tax cuts that have put us in this recession? Are we going to recognize what most of the country already knows, that our problems will not be solved by cutting the programs that help people, but by bringing down these high-interest rates and by cutting back on excessive defense spending? I hope we are going to have that courage, Mr. Speaker.

HEARINGS TO BE SET ON COAL MINER DEATHS

(Mr. GAYDOS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, today as we open the second session of the 97th Congress, a relentless series of tragedies in the Nation's coal mines—at least 40 deaths in less than 2 months—are giving us an idea of the possible consequences of unthinking budget reductions.

One coal miner has died for every working day of this new year.

The toll over the 16 working days of 1982 is 16 miners dead in explosions, rock falls, and powered haulage in Kentucky, West Virginia and Utah.

Five days is the longest the Nation has gone this year without a coal miner death.

This is a time for setting second session priorities.

While the supply siders have further budget cuts for the Mine Safety and Health Administration and other agencies as their first priority, this heavy and tragic toll makes an inquiry into these deaths the first priority of the Subcommittee on Health and Safety.

The Mine Safety and Health Administration had reduced miner deaths by nearly a 10-year low in 1980, and I do not believe conditions within the mines have grown more dangerous between then and now.

Conditions in the mines always are dangerous, unchangingly dangerous.

What has changed? The budget for MSHA and the number of inspectors it can field for one thing.

Therefore one point of the subcommittee inquiry will be to determine what link exists between the deaths—at least 24 in December and 16 in January—and the budget reductions of last year.

I implore the House to look in all decency at what an agency does as well as what it spends when the appropriations bills come rolling through.

MSHA is an agency that should have had an increase last year, and not a reduction, in my opinion.

Dates, times, and places for the hearings will be announced as soon as arrangements are completed.

LEGISLATION INTRODUCED TO AUTHORIZE AUXILIARY CHAMBER FOR LOCKS AND DAM NO. 26

(Mr. YOUNG of Missouri asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation which will fulfill the finding of need by the Upper Mississippi River Basin Commission's recently completed study of the future multiple use of the Mississippi River and authorize a second or auxiliary chamber at the replacement project for locks and dam No. 26.

The present locks and dam 26 was completed in 1938 and consists of the dam and two lock chambers, both 110 feet in width. The main lock is 600 feet in length and its auxiliary is 360 feet long.

For many years locks and dam 26, because of its strategic location as the first lock below the confluence of the upper Mississippi and Illinois Rivers, has been the major bottleneck along our inland waterway system. In 1978 Congress enacted Public Law 95-502 which, among other provisions, authorized a replacement dam with a single 1,200-foot lock.

Locks and dam 26 has been the subject of extensive legal action both before and after Congress acted in 1978. A combination of environmental groups and railroads tied up the project for several years. I am pleased to report that funds have been appropriated and construction commenced in April 1980, and work continues on this much-needed facility.

The new facility will not open until, at best, late 1988 and during the construction period, traffic demands at the existing facility will more rapidly exceed the capability of the overburdened and deteriorating facility.

According to a 1979 Peat, Marwick & Mitchell Co. report, shipment of farm products through locks and dam 26 increased from 1966 to 1978 by 19.9 million tons, or 150 percent. Shipment of chemicals through locks and dam 26 increased by 2.46 million tons, or 158 percent.

To illustrate the critical role locks and dam 26 in the export of grain, let me point out that 115 grain terminals are located above this point on the Upper Mississippi and Illinois Rivers. All grain shipped from these terminals to New Orleans and other Gulf of Mexico export locations must past through locks and dam 26, the critical congestion point for the grain export trade.

According to the Peat, Marwick & Mitchell's review, total tonnage at this point increased from 27.6 million tons in 1966 to 62.5 million tons in 1978. Grain products constituted about 54.6 percent of 1978 total tonnage.

Corps of Engineers data indicate that total tonnage at lock 26 reached 70.3 million tons in 1981 and could reach 88.9 million tons by 1990.

Peat, Marwick & Mitchell documented the 1976-78 average waiting time for the entire 9-month shipping season:

[In hours]

Year	Main chamber	Auxiliary chamber
1978	18.7	13.8

During the 1978 shipping season, the average tow waited nearly 19 hours to use the main chamber at locks No. 26 and nearly 14 hours to use the auxiliary chamber. Between 1977 and 1978, the average tow delay in the main and auxiliary chambers increased by 83 and 100 percent, respectively. On September 8, 1980, the average delay was 48 hours at the main chamber, slightly less at the auxiliary chamber, with 19 towboats northbound, 15 southbound, waiting to be locked through.

An auxiliary chamber is essential for proper maintenance and in times of emergencies in the main chamber. An April 1976 failure in the wall of the present main chamber tied up over 100 barge tows for 19 days. The smaller auxiliary chamber allowed some tows to pass through, but millions of dollars were nevertheless wasted.

Without a second lock at the new facility, maintenance problems could potentially paralyze the upper Midwest because navigation would be cut off at St. Louis. The Peat, Marwick & Mitchell report indicates that a sufficient number of rail cars are not available to handle the tonnage which would be stalled at Alton, Ill., by such problems.

Section 101 of Public Law 95-502 directed the upper Mississippi River Basin Commission (UMRBC) to prepare a comprehensive master plan for the management of the upper Mississippi River and its tributaries. Section 101 further directed the UMRBC to immediately initiate a specific evaluation of the economic need for a second lock at Alton, Ill. This report, submitted to Congress on January 1, 1982, stated that sufficient need exists for construction of a second chamber at replacement lock and dam 26.

It is my hope that, due to the need to incorporate designing and engineering plans into the Corps of Engineers construction schedule for the new facility, Congress will approve this legislation as swiftly as possible.

It is also my hope that this legislation will be enacted strictly on its merits, without being held hostage to waterway user tax/cost recovery proposals which are favored by the administration.

I am not alone in my concern that reversal of the policy of nearly 200 years of Federal responsibility for our Nation's ports and waterways will seriously harm the flow of commerce both on the domestic and international fronts.

Public Law 95-502 also imposed an escalating waterway fuel tax on shallowdraft commercial waterway operators. Congress, unsure of the effects such taxes would have on the Nation's water transportation system, mandated a comprehensive study of their impact. The results of this study were scheduled to be submitted and I strongly advise Congress and the administration to thoroughly analyze this study before taking further action on user charges.

We cannot, however, afford the luxury of time in authorizing a second chamber at lock and dam 26.

Let me emphasize that many of our Nation's ports and inland waterway facilities are strained to capacity, require modernization, and are subject to frequent breakdowns. We cannot overlook the national benefit and need for a modern waterway system, which in coordination with other modes of transportation will enhance the U.S. export trade while insuring the safe and efficient uninterrupted flow of commerce.

Mr. Speaker, my bill proposes that the second or auxiliary chamber be 110 feet in width like the present and new main chamber and 600 feet in length, exactly one-half the capacity of the new chamber. This would make the dual lock capacity exactly identical to the present lock and dam No. 27 at Granite City, Ill. Lock and dam 27 is the next locking facility below lock and dam 26 and the last such facility on the Mississippi River.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, a strong viable economy is one of the most valuable elements of national defense. Specifically, the economy serves as a vehicle for generating income to support our national defense and as a means of supporting our commitments to our allies outside the continental United States. First, the movement of grain in a critical element in our balance of trade and a favorable balance of trade can strengthen our economy. Second, a first-class navigation system is an essential requirement for moving materials for a military mobilization effort. We must take steps to prevent delays in moving vital goods. A second look at lock and dam 26 will prevent delays and thereby strengthen our national defense.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleague to join me in cosponsoring this legislation of vital interest to the Midwest and Nation as a whole. Let us act now and take the economies of building the auxiliary lock while construction is underway on the new facility.

ADMINISTRATION LACKS CONCERN FOR AMERICA'S BLACK AND MINORITY CITIZENS

(Mr. MILLER of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that members of both parties share my outrage at the President's extraordinary decision to grant millions of dollars in tax benefits to schools which blatantly practice racial discrimination. Providing a windfall for discriminatory private schools at a time when this administration is cutting off billions of dollars in Federal aid to public education is particularly shocking.

Denying Federal assistance to racist schools was never a social policy set by the faceless bureaucrats in the Internal Revenue Service, as the President pretends. It has long been a matter of Federal law, established by a Republican administration, reiterated time and again by successive administrations, and confirmed in numerous Federal courts, including the Supreme Court.

Humiliated by public and press reactions to this terrible decision, the President has scrambled to recover. He has now proposed that Congress consider legislation to reestablish existing law. But the legislation Mr. Reagan would have us debate will open the door to consideration of amendments which go far beyond the IRS issue—amendments which undermine fundamental civil rights laws and basic legal protections for minorities, women, and the handicapped.

The only solution needed is for Mr. Reagan to direct the IRS to continue to enforce the policy which the Congress and the courts have established. Neither the Congress nor the courts, however, can provide a solution to the embarrassment caused by the administration's blatant admission of its lack of concern for America's black and minority citizens.

THE LATE HONORABLE JAMES C. DAVIS OF GEORGIA

(Mr. LEVITAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, I have the unhappy duty this morning to announce the death of a former Member of this House, Hon. James C. Davis of Georgia, who died on December 28, 1981.

James C. Davis represented the Fifth Congressional District of Georgia, consisting of Fulton, De Kalb, and Rockdale counties, for seven terms during the 80th through 87th Congresses.

I will at the appropriate time, Mr. Speaker, ask for a special order so that Members of the House who so desire may make remarks appropriate to Hon. James C. Davis.

THE VIEW FROM $204 A WEEK

(Mr. VOLKMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House the recent editorial in Newsweek entitled "The View From $204 a Week." The editorial is written by Mrs. Vicki Williams a working mother from Huntington, Ind.

Mr. Speaker, I think this editorial shows the real concerns and needs of low- and middle-income America. Too many people are facing a grim 1982. Unemployment is increasing, the economy is on a downswing, recession, or depression depending on who you listened to is hurting everyone.

Mr. Speaker, Mrs. Williams states that she is tired of politicians and newspaper people "putting words in her mouth." I think it is time we stop telling people of this country how they feel about the Federal Government and instead, we must listen to our constituents.

Mr. Speaker, the people in my district, and I think nationwide, feel much like Mrs. Williams. Mrs. Williams states, "To me, Reaganomics is cruel and self-serving." I think more and more people feel the same way.

Mr. Speaker, as the second session of Congress begins, let us rethink our priorities for this year. Let us again listen to the people of this country and respond to their wishes. The American people want responsive Government officials and an economic program that reflects the needs of our society, not a program of helping the rich by burdening the poor.

STATEHOOD FOR PUERTO RICO

(Mr. CORRADA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CORRADA. Mr. Speaker, on January 12, President Ronald Reagan met at the Oval Office with Gov. Carlos Romero Barceló, former Gov. Luis A. Ferré, the mayor of San Juan Hernán Padilla and I, at which time he made an important statement concerning the political status of Puerto Rico. I am very pleased with President Reagan's words of encouragement and I trust that as we move ahead in this decade of the eighties the people of Puerto Rico will support statehood, thus allowing us to attain, as a community of American citizens, the only political status that can truly bring to us equality, full political maturity and dignity in our relationship with the United States.

The President's statement of January 12, 1982, on statehood for Puerto Rico reads as follows:

When I announced my candidacy for this office more than 2 years ago, I pledged to support statehood for the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, should the people of that island choose it in a free and democratic election. Today I reaffirm that support, still confident in my belief that statehood would benefit both the people of Puerto Rico and their fellow American citizens in the 50 states.

While I believe the Congress and the people of this country would welcome Puerto Rican statehood, this Administration will accept whatever choice is made by a majority of the island's population.

No nation, no organization nor individual should mistake our intent in this. The status of Puerto Rico is an issue to be settled by the peoples of Puerto Rico and the United States. There must be no interference in the democratic process.

Puerto Ricans have borne the responsibilities of U.S. citizenship with honor and courage for more than 64 years. They have fought beside us for decades and have worked beside us for generations. Puerto Rico is playing an important role in the development of the Caribbean Basin Initiative and its strong tradition of democracy provides leadership and stability in that region. In statehood, the language and culture of the island—rich in history and tradition—would be respected, for in the United States the cultures of the world live together with pride.

We recognize the right of the Puerto Rican people to self-determination. If they choose statehood, we will work together to devise a union of promise and opportunity in our Federal union of sovereign states.

THE COURAGE OF RONNIE SHELTON

(Mr. DAN DANIEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. DAN DANIEL. Mr. Speaker, recently, there appeared in the Star-Tribune of Chatham, Va., a very interesting article involving Mr. Ronnie Shelton, a 23-year-old resident of my congressional district.

I was so impressed with the story of his recovery from a harrowing experience that I would like to call this to the attention of the Members of the House.

In my opinion, the level of courage which Ronnie displayed is not unlike that exercised by the founders and developers of our country and is in very short supply today. He has my admiration as one who is not only courageous but self-reliant in an era characterized by an attitude of something for nothing.

The article follows:

[From the Star-Tribune, Dec. 24, 1981]

RONNIE'S COURAGE SAVES HIS LIFE

(By Preston Moses)

Ronnie Shelton is lucky to be alive today. He says he is thankful to the Lord for sparing his life.

This is a true story of what must be described as a miracle . . . How Ronnie, through his courage and determination to keep his "cool" in the face of death—saved his life. He is now on the road to recovery after a harrowing experience.

Ronnie, just 23, had taken over the job as miller of the old Tomahawk Mill near Climax earlier this year.

Tomahawk Mill is one of the last remaining water powered mills in the southside Virginia and has a reputation for making a fine grade flour and corn meal.

Ronnie took pride in his work as a young miller and had built up a good business by being polite to the customers and giving better service.

The fateful day was Tuesday, November 17. Ronnie had been busy waiting on customers selling more than usual that day. He had the mill running overtime grinding flour for the expected brisk sales before Thanksgiving.

Late that afternoon after all customers had gone from the mill—Ronnie there alone, started cleaning up and oiling the machinery. It was about 4:30 p.m. he went up to the second floor where he heard a cog squeaking.

He climbed up a ladder with his oil can and reached to apply oil to the cog. The ladder tilted, throwing Ronnie off balance, against a turning shaft. The spokes caught his shirt and jerked him into the whirling machinery with its maze of wheels, cogs, belts, cogs and pulleys.

With his clothing becoming entangled in the spokes of a pulley, Ronnie was spun around and around the shaft, but managed to hold on and got severe friction blisters to his arms and chest from turning shaft. His left leg was caught in a belt and carried through a cog that cut it off six inches below the knee.

As Ronnie was batted about in the clash with the machinery, he substained broken ribs, a broken right leg, a crushed hip bone and severe bruises and lacerations.

It all happened in a flash. Somehow, Ronnie managed to become free from the clanking, rumbling machinery and dropped six feet to the floor in a daze.

Ronnie is back home this week from the hospital, and after making a remarkable recovery from the injuries, he recounted the ordeal for the Star-Tribune reporter.

After falling to the floor, he said he first tried to get up, but immediately discovered he couldn't with one leg cut off and the other broken.

Ronnie says he realized he would bleed to death with blood gushing from the severed leg. All of his clothing had been torn off, except a sock on his right foot and the knitted neck band of his t-shirt. He snatched this from his neck and made a tourniquet to stop the loss of blood from his leg.

"I said to myself—don't panic, don't panic," he recalled.

He cried for help, but realized that no one was at the mill and besides the clanking machinery was making so much noise it drowned out his voice.

Unable to walk, Ronnie managed to move by pushing himself backward using his hands and sliding on his butt.

Coming to the steps, Ronnie tumbled down the steep incline to the first floor—where he slid himself to the outside onto the mill loading platform. There he hollered for help—but none came.

Keeping up his courage, and not allowing himself to black out, Ronnie managed to slide himself back inside the mill, thinking he would use the telephone to call for help. But the phone is on the wall and out of his reach.

He again slid himself to the mill porch and again began yelling for help . . . growing weaker all the time.

At that moment J. P. Thornton, who lives in the house on the hill above the mill, went outside to feed his dogs—and heard Shelton's cries.

Thornton says he went quickly to the mill . . . where he couldn't believe his eyes. There he saw Ronnie with one foot cut off, bloody and bleeding badly from the wound . . . and he was sitting up on the platform without a stitch of clothing except for a sock on his right foot.

Ronnie wanted to be put in Thornton's pick-up truck and carried to Chatham. It was there he was put on an ambulance and the Chatham Rescue Squad rushed him to the hospital.

Thornton recalls that as they were passing Shelton's home, about a half mile from the mill, Shelton asked that his wife not be told of the accident.

Thornton says Shelton seemed more worried about his wife than about himself. His wife was expecting a baby about that time, and he didn't want to upset her.

(Mrs. Shelton gave birth to a baby daughter 10 days later, and she was in the hospital the same time as her husband.)

When Mrs. Shelton learned of the accident about an hour later, she rushed to the Danville hospital, where she was told her husband had been sent to Duke University hospital in Durham.

Shelton explained that his left leg had been cut off leaving his foot hanging on by the skin. The doctors packed it in ice and sent him to Duke hospital, hoping it could be sewed back on, but the doctors there said the bone was crushed and couldn't be fitted together.

Shelton recalls that he suffered no great pain at the time the accident happened.

"I just became numb, and my leg felt like it had gone to sleep." It wasn't until he arrived in the hospital did he experience great pain.

Shelton says he avoided shock by continually telling himself he must not panic, to keep cool. "I kept saying it over and over to myself," he exclaimed.

After being released from the hospital, Shelton is recovering at the home of his wife's mother, where he seems to be in good spirits.

His right leg has about healed from the break, he has screws in his hip socket to keep it together, he feels no pain from the broken ribs. . . the blister burns on his chest and arms are gone.

His left leg has only a nub below the knee which he has to dress twice daily.

"I'm going back to the hospital January 11 to be fitted for an artificial leg and foot," he said cheerfully, "and I'll be able to walk as good as ever."

No, Ronnie is not bitter about the accident. He says he's thankful that the Lord spared him.

"I'm not a Christian. I haven't been saved, but when I'm able to get out, I am going to join the church," he declared.

What is he going to do when he gets an artificial leg, and becomes well again?

"I'm going back to running the mill. Mr. Walter Crider (of Huddleston Mill, N.C., who owns it) is saving the job for me, and I will become the miller again," he said.

Shelton says he is amazed by the cards and gifts of money he has received from churches and people.

"Some people have sent money I didn't know," he stated, "and I deeply appreciate it."

But Ronnie says he's not asking for handouts. He seems to be too proud to make an appeal for financial help. "I want to make my own way," he exclaimed.

He and his wife, the former Debbie Adkins, have a 3-year-old daughter, besides their new 20 day old baby girl.

Some people may complain about not having shoes—but Ronnie Shelton is not complaining about not having a foot . . . he's thankful he is still alive.

COMMEMORATING 100TH BIRTHDAY OF FRANKLIN DELANO ROOSEVELT

(Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, this week we in this House and the Nation commemorate the 100th birthday of Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

Franklin Roosevelt was a remarkable man in both his private and public life. He was in the American public conscience for three and a half decades and was our President for more than a dozen years. We learned many things under Franklin Roosevelt, including the dangers of excessive financial manipulation by the private sector and, perhaps more important, that there could be a public response to that manipulation.

In the words of a recent Roosevelt biographer:

His genius was that he included the excluded, and he taught that America is to be measured not only by the glitter of our wealth but by the splendor of our ideals.

TAX-EXEMPT PRIVATE SCHOOLS

(Mr. DIXON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, without warning, without justification, and apparently without forethought, the Reagan administration has dealt school desegreation efforts yet another telling blow. Its decision to eliminate—on its own—an 11-year-old policy prohibiting tax exemptions for segregated private schools gives aid and comfort, not to mention an indirect Government handout, to professional bigots who continue to flout almost 30 years of clear, consistent policy.

Now we are asked to believe that this is all a big mistake, that this administration still opposes discrimination "with every fiber of its being." Never mind that this administration has curtailed or eliminated programs that are the lifeblood of urban America, has sought to overturn existing voluntary school integration or affirmative action plans, and has sought crippling changes in the House-passed Voting Rights Act extension bill.

Mr. Speaker, black America is in danger of being moved to the back of the bus, and this administration apparently does not mind or does not care.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate agreed to the following resolutions:

S. RES. 280

Resolved, That a committee consisting of two Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House is assembled and that the Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

S. RES. 281

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

TAX-EXEMPT STATUS FOR PRIVATE SCHOOLS

(Mr. CONABLE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today, at the request of the President, the administration's bill to deal with the issue of tax-exempt status for private, nonprofit educational organizations with racially discriminatory policies. This is being done in order that the Congress may give its full attention to the matter and determine whether legislation is appropriate.

The controversy that has already attended the development of this bill demonstrates what a complex and difficult issue this is. Undoubtedly many refinements and changes in the legislation will be suggested by witnesses at the hearings scheduled by the Senate Finance Committee for February 1 and by the House Committee on Ways and Means for February 4 and during subsequent steps of the legislative process. These suggestions are welcomed and encouraged.

INTRODUCTION OF BILL TO RESCIND TAX BENEFIT PROVISIONS FOR MEMBERS OF CONGRESS

(Mr. WYLIE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, we have become inadvertently participants in a blunder which we need to correct immediately.

On December 16, the last day of the 1st session of the 97th Congress, we passed the black lung benefits bill. The black lung benefits bill had attached to it a provision which was nongermane, which was attached by the Senate, and which was the basis of an Internal Revenue Service rule which would allow a tax writeoff for living expenses for Members of Congress.

From the moment I realized what we had done, I was determined that we should correct this wrong. Accordingly, I have introduced a bill today to rescind the tax benefit provisions for Members of Congress included in the black lung bill and the IRS rule which was promulgated pursuant to it. Cosponsors are welcome.

OIL IMPORT FEES

(Mr. CONTE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing for myself and some of my colleagues a resolution expressing the opposition of the House of Representatives to the imposition of an import fee on crude oil and refined petroleum products.

As I have declared publicly, there are other, less onerous, less inequitable revenue-raising options available to this Government. For instance, modest increases in the Federal excise taxes on luxury items such as yachts, furs, jewelry, and expensive automobiles could generate billions of dollars in new revenues every year. The repeal of the provision in the Tax Act of 1981 which provides a tax deduction for payment of a "windfall profit tax" on crude oil production could recoup some $11 billion in lost revenues per year. An increase in these taxes clearly represents a preferable course of action; to impose a regressive tax on such a basic necessity as home heating oil is unconscionable.

Since my arrival to the Congress in 1959, I have believed firmly that only under the most extreme conditions, such as a national emergency, should a levy of this type be considered. The reasons today are basically the same as they were in 1959. First, an import fee would have a direct inflationary impact since it would raise the price of every barrel of oil consumed in this country. Any imposition of a tax of this nature affects consumers of petroleum products from New England to the Sun Belt and from the Atlantic States to the Pacific States. The constituents of every Member in this body would be affected adversely. It has been estimated that for every dollar of tax imposed, approximately $6.8 billion in additional costs to the consumer would be generated.

For my region of the country, New England, a fee of $5 per barrel would cost the oil-dependent homeowners and businesses an additional $1.9 billion per year. Due to the fact that homeowners in this region have already pared back to the bone their heating costs, such a fee would not increase significantly consumers' conservation efforts. Rather, it would only be a further drain on the family pocketbooks which now pay more than $1,300 annually for heating of homes.

Second, because of the major role which oil plays in our economy, an import fee would raise the costs of not only petroleum-based products, but all consumer goods. As I stated before, all consumers will be affected by such an act.

Third, by draining purchasing power from the economy, the recently passed economic recovery program would be stalled. The fee would lead to higher unemployment and lower output. This would be severe particularly in the oil-consuming industrial States.

Finally, it should be noted that this resolution emphasizes the language in the Trade Expansion Act of 1962 which limits the authority to impose import fees to situations in which national security is threatened. The current excess supply of crude does not justify a revenue-raising act in the name of national security.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that the Members of the House will see the wisdom of such a resolution and join with me in cosponsoring this measure.

LENNY SKUTNIK—A CONGRESSIONAL HERO

(Mr. PARRIS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, this past cold and icy January 13, a terrible tragedy occurred when an Air Florida 737 crashed into the 14th Street Bridge killing 78 people. I am sure all of my colleagues share my shock and sadness at this sudden catastrophe.

The day was grim and tragic and most thoughts were focused on the victims of the accident. However, if a shining light could glow through the terrible darkness of those hours, it would be because of the unselfish bravery of Lenny Skutnik, a congressional employee who was on his way home from work.

Like many other Federal employees, Lenny left his desk early because of the snowstorm, but when he saw the anxious commotion at the bridge—ambulances, helicopters, passengers bobbing in the water—he stopped his car, got out and joined the frustrated rescue workers on the river bank. When rescuers were unable to help a woman who could no longer cling to a life preserver, Lenny dove into the frigid Potomac River and saved her life.

Lenny Skutnik, whom I am proud to represent in Congress, without hesitation risked his own life to save that of another. There is no greater gift to give a fellow human than a chance to live.

Recognition of Lenny Skutnik's bravery should not go unnoticed. Too often the negatives of our society, thefts, killings, and kidnapings are brought to the forefront and not the positives.

This time I think we should honor this man for a positive and gallant deed. A deed for which we are all proud as fellow human beings. A deed which represents caring, bravery, and the dignity of mankind, a deed which is an example of all that is good in our society.

In honor of his bravery, I am proud to introduce today legislation that will allow Congress to honor, by the issuance of a special gold medal, one of our own, Lenny Skutnik, a man of unique courage.

CALIFORNIA SURVEY SHOWS CONTINUED SUPPORT FOR REAGAN PROGRAM

(Mr. HUNTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, the newspapers this morning indicate that President Reagan is wary of proposals to place new taxes on the American people.

I hope that the President refuses to propose these new taxes, and it is my opinion that if he knew the feelings of the people on this critical issue, he would hang tough and refuse to undo any part of his recovery program.

And, I, Mr. Speaker, would like the President to know that in my district in San Diego, Calif., my recent December survey revealed that when our citizens were asked if the tax cuts should be repealed, 76.5 percent said "no." And further, when asked the question "Do you feel that the Reagan program should be given more time to work?" 82.1 percent said "yes," the program should be given more time to work.

So hang in there, Mr. President, and do not fall into the pattern of procrastination and policy reversals that marked the Carter administration's economic program.

HEALTH PLANNING

(Mr. LIVINGSTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, since entering Congress in 1977, I have been opposed to the national network of health system agencies originally established under the National Health Planning Act of 1974. In 1979, I unsuccessfully attempted to amend the act to bring about some practical reform in the composition of these agencies and their responsibilities. However, throughout this process I have remained philosophically opposed to the performance of these regulatory agencies, since Federal studies at the time proved the ineffectiveness of the health planning law and inability of the local health system agencies to control health care costs. My feelings have not changed, for additional studies of the health planning system continue to document the ineffectiveness of these regulatory bodies. More recently, I have been encouraged about the recommendations from this administration to phase out the health planning system. As a member of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Labor, Health, and Education, I have advocated the allocation of our scarce budgetary resources to programs of direct assistance to the needy, rather than to the self-aggrandizing health system agencies. The Appropriations Committee wisely reduced local health planning funding from $82.8 million in fiscal year 1981 to $38.4 million under the fiscal year 1982 continuing resolution. Now, as my colleague from Alabama, Mr. SHELBY, has said so well: "It is time Congress took the logical next step."

The Members of the House can take this next step and save our taxpayers additional millions of dollars by joining Mr. SHELBY and over 25 other Members as cosponsors of H.R. 4554, a bill to repeal the Federal Government's entire health planning system by September 30, 1982. I believe many Members will want to join Mr. SHELBY and their colleagues as cosponsors of H.R. 4554 after reviewing a "Summary of the Data on the Impact of Health Planning" as prepared by the 17,000-member American Society of Internal Medicine. This summary will appear in today's Extensions of Remarks and underscores the ineffectiveness of the health planning system since its inception.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY WOULD REGULATE U.S. BUSINESS

(Mr. SCHULZE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, from time to time, I have addressed the House on the radical proposal currently being considered by the European communities, attempting to coerce U.S. companies into negotiations with trade unions in Europe before virtually any major corporate decision. But the European assault on transnational business goes beyond even this proposal.

Other initiatives of questionable political inspiration are also being actively pursued. One proposed directive would force companies to adopt two-tier boards of directors, giving trade unions a vote in corporate planning and management. Another would require companies—including American companies governed by American law—to publish annual reports and financial statements in Europe, subject to the approval of European authorities.

Finally, it has even been seriously proposed that U.S. parent companies be required to manage their European subsidiaries not in the interests of the company as a whole or of its shareholders, but in the interests of each subsidiary. A corporate decision deemed by EC institutions to be harmful to the EC subsidiary would—according to the proposed ninth directive—entail the personal, unlimited liability of directors in the United States.

Mr. Speaker, these proposals are radical. They are unnecessary. They would be counterproductive.

My bill, H.R. 4407, would amend the Trade Act of 1974 to make these proposals potential targets of a section 301 action and would send the EC a message: This Congress believes that the United States and the several states must not abandon their authority to establish and to regulate American business. That is our role. It is not the role of the European Communities.

THE FEDERAL BUDGET, DEFICITS, AND THE ECONOMY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. DANNEMEYER) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, budgetary considerations dominated the 1st session of the 97th Congress. As we return for the start of the second session, it strongly appears that fiscal policy will again occupy center stage. The Federal budget, this time for fiscal year 1983 and beyond, will be the top item on our agenda.

When we came back to the Nation's Capital at the end of the August recess, high interest rates were the primary consideration on our minds. Unfortunately, we failed to take remedial action. We left Washington for our home districts after simply reaffirming, in a pro forma fashion, the outdated first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1982. While I was in California these past several weeks, I have seen the impact of our failure to act. The national unemployment rate has climbed to 8.9 percent amidst forecasts that it will climb over the 9-percent mark in the near future. In Anaheim, Calif., the local Delco Remy automotive battery manufacturing plant laid off 40 percent of its current work force on Monday, January 11, 1982. Just 2 weeks ago, the plant employed 550 people. After the layoffs, the plant work force is down to 225. The problems of the auto industry are varied and complex, but high interest rates have certainly aggravated the situation.

The start of this session is an appropriate time to examine the upcoming Federal budget deliberations with an eye toward distilling the relationships between deficits, Federal borrowing, and the economy. The debate about the nature and role of deficit spending has been joined. Some policymakers, even within the Reagan White House, are downplaying the importance of curbing deficit spending. Those who are less than deeply concerned by the latest deficit projections must not be allowed to hold sway while the rest of us remain silent. A rigorous analysis and defense of traditional fiscal conservative reasoning on deficits, inflation and interest rates are in order.

INTERESTS RATES

Interest rates reached record highs last fall, peaking in October. Treasury bills, as a proxy for other market interest rates generally, are a good example of the latest trends. The peak for 3-month Treasury bills was reached on November 2, 1981, when the interest rate hit 12.695 percent. The rate dipped to almost 10 percent in early December. However, on January 18, 1982, the rate went back up, this time to 12.505 percent. The rate the week before was 12.121 percent. Six-month Treasury bills followed a similar path. The average rate on 6-month securities topped off at 13.619 percent on October 26, 1981. On January 18, 1982, the 6-month average rate was 13.102 percent, up from the previous week's average of 12.806 percent. The same is true for other rates—commercial paper, New Aaa utilities, new Baa utilities, and bond buyer municipals index of 20 bonds.

Clearly, if the upward trend is not reversed, the interest rate sensitive sectors of the economy will be damaged further. The auto, housing, and consumer durable sectors, and their supplier industries, are still recovering from the high interest rates of 1980 and 1981. Economic recovery will be shallow, at best, under these conditions.

Many analysts have attributed the shakiness of financial markets, at least in part, to concern over Federal deficits and inflation. Considering the magnitude of some of the forecasts, concern is more than justified.

HOW LARGE WILL THE DEFICIT BE?

In December of last year, the economists at the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) reportedly informed the White House that they expected a fiscal year 1982 deficit of $109 billion unless corrective steps were taken. The OMB analysis included figures of $152 billion for fiscal year 1983 and $162 billion in fiscal year 1984.

Other sources independently arrived at similar conclusions. Just before Christmas, President Reagan met with Senate Republican committee chairmen. They presented him with the forecasts of the Senate Budget Committee. These numbers indicated that an $82 billion deficit could occur in fiscal year 1982, increasing to $165 billion in fiscal year 1983 and a staggering $215 billion in fiscal year 1984.

The Congressional Budget Office and private economists, while differing on the exact numbers, produced projections within the range of the above numbers. While the President will not formally submit his budget message to Congress until February 8, 1982, we are told through the news media that the deficit for fiscal year 1983 will be around $75 billion. Presidential advisers appear to be excited that they have managed to hold the deficit below $100 billion.

DO DEFICITS MATTER OR NOT?

The various "guesstimates" about the possible or probable size of the deficits have sparked yet another debate on the economics of deficit spending. The most controversial incident occurred before a seminar of the American Enterprise Institute in early December 1981 when William A. Niskanen, a member of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, suggested that deficits were not as important as once thought. He discounted the "crowding out" effect of deficits in the Nation's credit markets. Coming after the change in status of the priority of a balanced budget from a promise in 1984 to a goal, such talk produced justifiable outrage. The incident at the AEI seminar, however, was only one in series of instances in which the role of deficits has been dowplayed.

There are four basic myths most frequently retold by those who challenge the position that deficits do matter as the principal engine of inflation and interest rates.

The first myth is that deficits are not important because they are only a small percentage of GNP. A variation on this theme is that a deficit of $50, or $75 or $100 billion is trivial in an economy producing in the range of $3 trillion in gross national product. First let us look at the issue within the framework of the comparison. Even assuming that the relationship between deficits and GNP is the operative one, we must note that while the deficit as a percentage of GNP is currently 2 percent, it is expected to double to 4 percent by 1984, according to Martin Feldstein of Harvard, under current conditions and policies. So what, the GNP school will retort, 4 percent is still trivial in an economy of $3 trillion.

The important point is that comparing deficits to GNP is not very instructive. The gross national product includes designer blue jeans, record albums, refrigerators, toasters, accounting fees and baseball bats. The Government does not finance deficits with goods and services directly. Deficits are financed in the credit markets of the country, a point I will return to shortly.

The second myth is that deficits are not important because there is enough money to go around for everyone—private individuals, corporations, public agencies, and the Federal Government. Spokesmen for this point of view inform us that credit demands are low from the private sector, particularly in a recession. This may mean that the 1982 deficit will have less of a upward impact on interest rates than would otherwise be true, but such a condition does not help us very much in planning for 1983 or in understanding why deficits are important. Just because credit may be available in 1982 does not contradict the maxim that deficit spending, when not monetized in whole or in part, will put upward pressure on interest rates. The upward pressure on interest rates from Federal borrowing may be offset, in whole or in part, by downward pressure on interest rates from a slack in private demand. This is probably true today. I doubt, however, that it is in the economy's long-term interest to devise a budget policy based on an assumption of low private demand due to a recession. Our goal should be economic growth, not private sector stagnation.

The third myth is closely linked to the second one. This concept is that the deficit is really not as large as it appears because most of it is caused by the recession. In a recession, goes the conventional description, Federal revenues decline with unemployment, while Federal spending for unemployment compensation and other benefit programs rises. Both the decrease in revenues and the increase in spending result in a larger budget deficit. No one can dispute that process and its result. However, those who promote this notion go on to say that when the economy recovers, the opposite will occur and the deficit will shrink. Such a "leap of logic" misses the point that the deficits in the first instance, whether recession induced or not, set other economic forces in motion that make it more difficult for the economy to recover. This analysis of the relationship between deficits and the economy is a prescription for doing nothing.

The fourth and final major myth is centered on the incomplete comparison that other countries, notably Japan and West Germany, run much larger deficits yet have lower rates of inflation and interest rates than we do. The implication is that the road to material happiness is paved by higher deficits. At a minimum, this view suggests a passive approach to deficit spending.

The comparison is incomplete because several critical factors are missing. The most important missing link is the comparative rate of saving. As noted earlier, deficits are financed by savings, not by gross national product. Japan and West Germany have comparatively larger deficits, but they also have comparatively much larger rates of saving. Japan's rate is four times as much as that of the United States. West Germany's rate is twice as much. Specifically, the United States rate is around 5.5 percent, compared to 20.2 percent in Japan and 12.5 percent in West Germany.

The key variable in the relationship between deficit spending and the economy is the interaction of the supply of savings and the borrowing demands of the Federal Government.

THE TIP OF THE ICEBERG

The shortfall between revenues and expenditures in the unified Federal budget that defines the size of the deficit is but the most visible and the most discussed component of national fiscal policy. The problem of the impact of the Federal Government on the Nation's credit markets is much broader than the figures on the deficit would indicate. The Federal Government borrows money, and heavily influences the borrowing of money, outside of the activities reflected in the unified budget. The budget deficit is literally but the tip of an iceberg. Appropriately enough, a November 1981 newsletter of the Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co., carried the title, "The Tip of the Iceberg," and outlined a thorough analysis of the varied demands on the credit markets generated by the Federal Government. The data compiled by author Irwin L. Kellner, senior vice president and economist, should be must reading as we commence the 1983 budget cycle. Mr. Kellner writes:

> In my view, Washington's inability to balance its books is even more important than it appears. This is because the reported deficit is but the tip of the Federal financing iceberg. And like the real thing, what you don't see can hurt you every bit as much as what you do see, if you hit it.

Mr. Kellner's analysis shows that the Federal presence in the Nation's credit markets is indeed quite staggering. Quite candidly it was almost beyond belief, until I read his complete description. In fiscal year 1981, the Treasury had to cover a budget deficit of about $58 billion. In addition, off budget spending was covered through the Federal Financing Bank at the level of $17 billion. Federally sponsored activities totaled an additional $28 billion. Finally, the Government assisted some private borrowers over others through loan guarantee arrangements, adding another $51.3 billion to the total. These four categories—the unified budget deficit, the off-budget spending, the sponsored activities, and the loan guarantees—place the magnitude of Federal borrowing at $154.5 billion in 1981.

While Federal borrowing is more widespread than reference to deficit numbers would indicate, the pool from which the total sum of borrowing must be financed is smaller than many analysts would have us believe.

As noted earlier when discussing several myths about deficits, Federal borrowing comes out of the supply of savings, not out of the gross national product or other measures of the aggregate economy. However, the definition of total savings is also important in gaging the real impact of Federal borrowing. Kellner defines total savings as gross private savings of households and corporations, plus State and local government surpluses and capital grants received by the United States less net foreign investment and capital consumption allowances. The latter concept—capital consumption allowances—is very important. The capital consumption allowance is the amount of savings necessary to maintain the current stock of housing and capital in the economy. In other words, it is the amount of credit needed just to stay even. Excluding such an amount for comparison purposes with Federal borrowing is quite reasonable, if one is looking to gage the degree to which the Government affects new activity and economic growth. Certainly if the economy is to follow a path of long-term recovery, and the United States is to become competitive in world markets, plant expansion and modernization will be critical. However, such expansion and modernization will require that new credit is both available and affordable.

On the basis of total Federal borrowing and the above definition of total savings, Kellner calculates the percentage of savings consumed by Government borrowing at 78.8 percent in 1981. As recently as 1979, this percentage was only 46.7 percent. No wonder interest rates hit record highs in 1980 and 1981.

Kellner concludes with this challenge:

> Going through this exercise makes it very difficult to come up with any kind of an optimistic conclusion over where this economy is headed. If this Administration cannot eliminate the visible budget deficit, who else will be able to do it?
> Additionally, since more and more Federal government credit demands take place in ways that are not measurable in the budget but certainly are felt in the financial markets, how will these activities be brought under control? That they have to be brought under control there is no doubt. For if they are not, more and more of national savings will be preempted by Washington. This will cause interest rates to remain high, the economy to remain depressed and our potential to compete in world markets to become seriously diminished.
> Are we going to accept this or are we ready to start scaling back the scope of government to not only do more for ourselves, but do it in a more efficient way, in a climate of less inflation and lower interest rates? Only time will tell.

This is the question that the second session of the 97th Congress will be called upon to answer as the 1983 budget works its way through the legislative process.

Mr. Kellner of Manufacturers Hanover is not alone in his assessment of the Federal Government and the credit markets. While Kellner looked back to the record of 1981, Henry Kaufman, chief economist for Salomon Bros, released projections for 1982 on January 4, 1982, for all credit areas, public and private. Under the heading "Summary and Conclusions," his report states:

> A confrontation between the credit needs of the U.S. Treasury and those of business corporations is shaping up for 1982. This conflict, which is not typical of the early stages of a recovery, promises to produce a record level of net new credit market financing, and a substantial rebound in interest rates.

Kaufman quantified the conflict by projecting a 1982 budget deficit of $80 billion, which he has since revised upward to $90 billion. He notes that:

> The ballooning Federal budget deficit and the borrowing needs of Federal credit agencies will push the growth in privately held Federal debt up to a record $135 billion.

Kaufman projects that the financing needs of the Federal Government in 1982 will jump $22 billion over 1981, and absorb "nearly half the expected increase in new funds available for all forms of credit." It goes without saying that Kaufman also projects a rise in interest rates by the end of the year.

FEDERAL SPENDING MUST BE CUT

Economist Martin Feldstein of Harvard, president of the National Bureau of Economic Research, put his finger on the problem and the solution in a Wall Street Journal editorial of January 19, 1982. He wrote:

What then should be done to decrease the deficit? The key is reducing federal nondefense spending. The overgrowth of government spending that has occurred in the past two decades would deserve substantial pruning even if there were no deficit. Much of the increase in government spending during these years has been due to the introduction and expansion of programs that are wasteful and are the source of serious distortions in economic incentives.

In July of last year, I released an inventory of possible additional budget cuts that totaled $52.3 billion. In September and October I delineated each of the 272 specific items in a series of 12 special orders on the floor of the House. When the second budget resolution was considered in December 1981, I tried to persuade the Rules Committee to allow me to offer a substitute resolution embodying a revised list of 310 cuts and a total of $42.7 billion, or 6 percent of projected outlays in 1982. The Rules Committee reported out a closed rule and no amendments were in order. This followed a similar attempt in May of last year to give the House a chance to balance the budget through spending reductions which was also blocked by the Rules Committee. When the third resolution for 1982, or the first resolution for 1983, come to the floor, I will again seek to provide the House with an opportunity to meet Mr. Kellner's challenge.

The vote on the closed rule last month indicates that a large number of Members, on both sides of the aisle, are in favor of a more open process on budget resolutions. The vote on the rule was 248 in favor and fully 154 against it. Those opposed reflected a bipartisan division of 106 Republicans and 48 Democrats. This is a large number of negative votes on a procedural matter which is not normally the subject of controversy. Quite candidly, one begins to wonder sometimes why it is that the leadership of this institution is reluctant or unwilling to even allow the House to consider, much less adopt, the alternative of a balanced budget through spending reductions. I am hopeful that the growing deficit projections and their implications, together with the expressed sentiment of a large bipartisan group of Members on the rule, will result in action by the Rules Committee to permit the offering of my substitute at the appropriate time in the coming session.

THE ULTIMATE ANSWER IS A BALANCED BUDGET

The American people and their elected representatives at the State level are actually way out in front of Congress in perceiving the link between deficits and the economy and the need for a balanced budget.

A silent revolution has been under way at the State level for quite some time, and soon may be literally at our door steps. Last week, Alaska became the 31st State of the Union to have its legislature adopt a resolution calling for a constitutional convention limited to consideration of an amendment to require a balanced budget. Only 3 more States, for a total of 34, are needed before a convention would become a reality. Nine States have acted favorably in one house of the legislature. Three of the nine have called upon Congress to submit a balanced budget amendment for ratification. A fourth State, Illinois, has done the same.

Put in another perspective, States representing 72 percent of the U.S. population have either adopted a resolution by one or both houses of the State legislature. If Illinois is added, then 77 percent of the States on the basis of population have acted in some manner on this issue.

Congress must act to bring the Federal fiscal house in order before the States force us to act on a balanced budget. The American public is also in line with the States on this issue.

On January 12, 1982, the Los Angeles Times and the Cable News Network released a nationwide poll. Of those surveyed, 40 percent thought that a balanced budget is the most important step to cool inflation. Three-fourths of the respondents believe that a balanced budget would at least be helpful in the fight against inflation.

Congress should heed the answer to this question:

Which do you think is the best way for the government to get the economy moving again—should the government step up spending in order to reduce unemployment or should the government hold down spending in order to balance the budget?

	Percent
Step up spending	16
Hold down spending	62
Not sure	14

Confirmation of this public perception comes from Richard Wirthlin's conclusion after examining data compiled by his firm, Decision Making Information, last month:

Of paramount importance to most voters is the notion of balancing the budget. In order to do this, voters prefer to see additional cuts in government spending rather than resorting to tax increases.

CONCLUSION

Deficits do indeed matter. Wall Street knows it, as the Kellner and Kaufman reports make quite clear. Main Street knows it, too, as found by the L.A. Times/Cable News Network poll and the DMI survey. The States have spoken. Congress must move toward a balanced budget in two ways during the new session: First, by submitting an amendment on a balanced budget and tax limitation to the several States for ratification; and second, by making cuts in Federal spending for fiscal years 1982 and 1983. The long-term course must also include a reexamination of off-budget borrowing activities of the Federal Government. This will not be an easy task, but it is a necessary one if economic growth, reduced inflation, lower unemployment, and lower interest rates are to become a reality.

FURTHERING THE SECURITY OF ONE'S HOUSE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. FISH) is recognized for 15 minutes.

● Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, as a victim of crime last year, I share the American public's deep concern about the rising crime rate. The FBI's figures for 1980 evidence an 11-percent increase in the number of violent crimes committed in the United States. Similarly, the most recent figures released by the Bureau of Justice statistics in the Justice Department indicate that in 1980, nearly 5 million American households were touched by rape, robbery, or assault. Property crimes are even more prevalent. Each year, 25 percent of our households experience larceny and an additional 7 percent are burglarized.

These figures dramatically illustrate what we all know only too well: Government has failed to fulfill its fundamental responsibility to protect innocent citizens against the violent and capricious attacks of those bent on criminal activity. In response, law-abiding Americans have been forced to resort to expensive security measures to protect their besieged homes. I believe that the Government should help bear the unfortunate burden of these expenditures.

Mr. Speaker, for this reason, I am today introducing legislation to provide a credit against Federal income tax for individuals who install security devices in their homes. My bill differs from others which have been previously introduced in two major respects.

First, it provides a higher maximum credit for the elderly who are heavily victimized by the fear of crime and suffer most acutely crime-related physical injury and financial loss.

These people, who are often on fixed incomes, are least able to shoulder the burden of security expenditures. Second, my bill takes into account changes in the crime rate. When the number of crimes in the United States increases, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to adjust the maximum credit allowable to reflect that increase. Where Government achieves some success in fulfilling its duty to fight crime, and the crime rate decreases, the Secretary of the Treasury must adjust the maximum credit downward. My approach thus contains a financial incentive for Government to improve its crime program.

Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Subcommittee on Crime, I have been involved in numerous legislative efforts aimed at reducing crime, including bail reform and victims' assistance, both of which have been strongly endorsed by the President and the Attorney General. Until such time as these efforts achieve fruition and produce their desired effects on the crime rate, the Government must step in and share some of the crushing financial expenses which crime generates. I believe that my bill is a modest acknowledgment of the fact that Government, rather than the law-abiding taxpayer, should bear the awesome duty of protection.

I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this bill and, for their benefit, I submit the following summary of the provisions of my tax credit legislation:

HIGHLIGHTS OF SECURITY DEVICE TAX CREDIT BILL INTRODUCED BY HON. HAMILTON FISH, JR.

The Security Device Tax Credit Bill would provide a tax credit for certain expenditures made by individual taxpayers to purchase and install security devices in their homes. This bill differs from other similar bills in that it (1) provides for a higher maximum credit for persons who have attained age 65, and (2) provides for the maximum credit to be adjusted for increases or decreases in the crime rate.

A. Credit Allowed. In general, a taxpayer is entitled to a credit in each tax year of an amount equal to 25 percent of the security expenditures he has made during that year, up to a maximum of $250. For persons who have attained age 65, the credit allowable is equal to 100% of such expenditures, up to a maximum of $500. The minimum credit allowable is $10. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to adjust the $250/$500 maximum to reflect any increase or decrease in the crime rate, as reported in the FBI's Uniform Crime Reports. Unlike analogous cost-of-living adjustments, the crime rate adjustments take into account decreases as well, since there is less justification for the credit when the government has been successful in fulfilling its responsibility to reduce crime.

B. Limitations. The credit is not allowable against certain penalty taxes, such as those imposed for premature distributions from certain retirement accounts. Unused credit allowances may be carried over to three succeeding tax years. No credit is permitted with respect to expenditures which are claimed as a business deduction.

C. Qualifying Security Devices. The credit is allowable with respect to expenditures made for the purchase and installation of locks, alarms, protective window and door bars with emergency release features, or other items designed to provide a warning of, or a deterrent to, unlawful entry or unlawful injury to person or property. The device must be installed in or on a dwelling place (including a boat, van or mobile home) which is located in the United States and which is the principal residence of the taxpayer. The taxpayer need not be the owner of the dwelling place. The device must: (1) meet any performance or quality standards promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, after consultation with the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development and the Attorney General, (2) be originally used by the taxpayer, and (3) reasonably be expected to remain in operation for at least three years. The credit is not allowable with respect to devices installed primarily for the purpose of securing a swimming pool or other hazard.

D. Special Rules. Special rules are included to permit joint occupants, tenant-stockholders in cooperative housing corporations, and members of condominium associations to take their proportionate shares of expenditures made for security devices. Any increase in the basis of the dwelling place resulting from the expenditure is reduced by the amount of the credit allowed.

E. When Allowed. The credit is available for expenditures made after December 31, 1981.●

THE UNITED NATIONS GLOBAL DRUG STRATEGY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. GILMAN) is recognized for 30 minutes.

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, as a U.S. representative to the 36th session of the United Nations General Assembly, I had the opportunity to help draft the U.S. initiated resolution (A/C.3/36/L.77) on an international drug abuse control strategy that was adopted today by the U.N. General Assembly. The resolution, which was cosponsored by Australia, Bolivia, India, Malaysia, Mali, Morocco, Pakistan, Sweden, and Turkey: First, adopts the international drug control strategy and basic 5-year program of action of resolution 1 (XXIX) of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs; second, requests the Commission to establish a task force to review, monitor and coordinate the implementation of the international control strategy and program of action, and to submit an annual report to the Commission on the progress made in implementing the drug strategy program; third, requests the Commission to review the report of its task force and report ultimately to the General Assembly at its 38th session and annually thereafter; fourth, requests the Secretary General, within available resources, to take the necessary steps to implement the international strategy and program of action; fifth, urges that the strategy and program be given the highest priority by all governments, and be implemented and supported by all states, international organizations, and private institutions; and sixth, urges member states to initiate or increase contributions to the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control.

In general, the strategy calls for greater attention to the issues of drug abuse both within the U.N. agencies and elsewhere. Specifically, it recommends an increase in programs aimed at drug abuse control in the specialized U.N. agencies including the World Health Organization (WHO), the International Labor Organization (ILO), the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO), and the U.N. Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO), as well as in the U.N. Development Program (UNDP) and the other development-oriented programs. The strategy further recommends that the increased attention to U.N. drug-related activities should be part of regular agency programs and budgets because of the large impact drug abuse has on many specific areas of social concern.

With respect to the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control (UNFDAC), it is disheartening that only a handful of nations have contributed $100,000 or more to the U.N. Drug Fund. In 1980, 35 nations or only 22 percent of the members of the United Nations contributed nearly $5.5 million to the fund. In 1979, 45 nations contributed only $4.6 million to UNFDAC. As of October 31, 1981, 33 nations contributed slightly more than $2.5 million and at the U.N. Pledging Conference for Development Assistance on November 3-4, 1981, only 18 nations, some of whom have already contributed to UNFDAC for this year, pledged nearly $3.5 million.

Surely an international community of 157 nations can contribute more than a few million dollars to wage a global assault on drug production, trafficking, transshipping, and abuse. Some nations, including those who are most adversely affected by illicit drug production, trafficking, transshipping, and abuse, have failed to contribute a single penny to UNFDAC.

Mr. Speaker, in an effort to bring to the attention of my colleagues the U.N.'s efforts to prevent and control drug abuse throughout the world, I am inserting at this point in the RECORD, the complete text of U.N. General Assembly resolution L. 77, together with several lists of contributions and pledges that have been made to the U.N. Drug Fund.

U.N. RESOLUTION ON AN INTERNATIONAL DRUG ABUSE CONTROL STRATEGY (A/C.3/36/L.77)

(Sponsors: Australia, Bolivia, India, Malaysia, Mali, Morocco, Pakistan, Sweden, Turkey, United States of America)

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Having received the report from the Economic and Social Council containing the proposed international drug abuse control strategy that was requested by the General Assembly in resolutions 32/124 of 16 December 1977, 33/168 of 20 December 1978, 34/177 of 17 December 1979, and 35/195 of 15 December 1980;

Considering that the scourge of drug abuse continues to spread and has reached epidemic proportions in many parts of the world, and that, as specified in document A/36/193, it is necessary to adopt scientific, technical, and political measures commensurate with the gravity of the problem;

Emphasizing the conclusion of resolution 1 (XXIX) of the 1981 Session of the Commission on Narcotic Drugs (Commission) that in order for any international action in the field of drug abuse to be successful, the full and active cooperation and dedication of all countries must be forthcoming;

Recognizing the urgent need for an effective, comprehensive coordinated global strategy to prevent and control drug trafficking, illicit demand and drug abuse, as well as for comprehensive, coordinated strategies at regional and national levels;

1. Adopts the international drug control strategy and basic five-year programme of action to resolution 1 (XXIX) of the Commission forwarded by Economic and Social Council decision 1981/113;

2. Urges that the drug control strategy and the programme of action be given priority by all Governments and be implemented as quickly as possible by the relevant bodies of the United Nations and other international organizations;

3. Requests the Commission, within available resources, to establish a task force, in consultation with the Directors General of the appropriate specialized agencies and other UN drug-related bodies, composed of representatives of these agencies and bodies and representatives of the Member States most interested in and affected by the production, trafficking, and consumption of and demand for illegal drugs, as well as those interested in and affected by the licit production of drugs, to review, monitor and coordinate the implementation of the international control strategy and the programme of action and to submit a report to each session or special session of the Commission on the progress made in implementing the drug strategy and programme, and to provide any recommendations it deems necessary regarding future revision of such strategy and programme of action;

4. Requests the Commission to review the report of its task force and to report thereon through the Economic and Social Council to the General Assembly at its 38th Session and annually thereafter;

5. Urges all Member States, Non-member States, parties to the international drug control treaties, specialized agencies and other international organizations and private institutions concerned with the drug abuse problem to participate in and support activities related to international drug control strategy and policies;

6. Also urges, in order to ensure success of the international drug control strategy and to give a firm impetus to the battle of the world community against international drug traffickers that Member States initiate or increase contributions to the United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to transmit the text of the present resolution and related documents to all Member States, Non-member States, parties to the international drug control treaties and to all relevant international, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations.

LET POLAND BE POLAND

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, Chairman ZABLOCKI and I have today introduced legislation and will bring it to the floor tomorrow to permit the showing on U.S. television stations of a U.S. International Communication Agency film, "Let Poland Be Poland: A Day of Solidarity With the People of Poland." This must be passed by the House and Senate this week.

This legislation is absolutely necessary because only by specific authorization of Congress can ICA films, which are produced as part of the U.S. Government's foreign information program, be shown within the United States.

The film represents an effort by ICA to dramatize to the world the Russian-ordered oppression of the Polish people.

It is slated for showing on January 31 on public broadcasting facilities and subsequently on radio and other outlets across the country.

Among the participants will be President Ronald Reagan, Speaker TIP O'NEILL, British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, West German Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, Romuald Spasowski, former Polish Ambassador to the United States; Nobel Laureate Czeslaw Milosz, and Government leaders of Portugal, Turkey, Belgium, Italy, and Luxembourg. The presentation also will include a film of Pope John Paul II's trip to Poland.

I am honored to take the lead in introducing this legislation on behalf of the administration. The world and the American people should have the opportunity to know the full scope of the Communist oppression in Poland.

The situation in Poland is worsening, not improving. The world, especially Western Europe, is showing shocking indifference. This dramatic presentation, hopefully, will shock the world into realizing the seriousness of the situation in Poland.●

SIXTY-FOURTH ANNIVERSARY OF UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, on January 22, 1918, the fondest hopes of the Ukrainians were realized when the parliament proclaimed the independent Ukrainian National Republic. The reality of freedom was shortlived, however, because by 1922, the Bolsheviks forced their way into power and resumed persecutions, relocations of whole villages, exiles of Ukrainian leaders, brutal starvations, and wholesale executions. Millions of brave Ukrainians perished during the terrible years of Stalin's rule, and through it all, the Ukrainians remained steadfast in their resolve to regain their freedom and national sovereignty.

The Ukrainian Congress Committee of America, Illinois Division, sponsored a banquet in observance of Ukrainian independence on Sunday, January 24, at the St. Nicholas Ukrainian Catholic School Auditorium, in Chicago. Dr. Myroslaw Charkewycz is the organization's outstanding president.

The Russian Communist oppression of the Ukrainian people and their cultural and religious heritage continues, and an article from the Ukrainian Quarterly follows on the campaign against religious institutions:

Campaign Against The Ukrainian Catholic Church Continues.—In its two issues of March 24 and March 26, 1981, Radyanska Ukraina, the official organ of the Council of Ministers and the Central Committeee of the Communist Party of Ukranine, carried a scathing attack on the Ukrainian Catholic Church. The author of these two diatribes is Klym Dmytruk, the pseudonym of a KGB agent.

The cause of these latest attacks is the approval by Pope John Paul II of the Ukrainian Catholic Synod under the leadership of Patriarch Josyf Cardinal Slipyj in Rome.

The Ukrainian Catholic bishops who met in the fall of 1980 not only approved the Synod, but also denounced the so-called Moscow-engineered "sobor" of of the Ukrainian Catholic Church which voted for the abrogation of the Union of Brest (1596) and "incorporated" some 6 million Ukrainian Catholics into the Kremlin-supported Russian Orthodox Church against their will.

KGB operator Dmytruk, in assailing the Ukrainian Catholic Synod, calls it a "rude interference into the internal affairs" of the USSR, and a violation of the Helsinki Accords. As is known, the Ukrainian Catholic bishops appealed to the Soviet government to restore the Ukrainian Catholic Church in Ukraine, a step wholly approved by Pope John Paul II.

The Communist scribe also assailed the Ukrainian radio broadcast of the Vatican Radio and members of its editorial staff which he said broadcast "Ukrainian bourgeois nationalism, masked under religious coloring."

He also denounced Patriarch Josyf Slipyj and such prelates as Rev. Dr. Ivan Hrynioch, Rev. Peter Steciuk, Rev. Sofron Mudry and others.

Mr. Speaker, it was for these reasons that I cosponsored House Concurrent Resolution 123 on the resurrection of the national churches in Ukraine, and also joined with many of my colleagues in sending a letter to the Soviet Ambassador in Washington urging the release of imprisoned members of the Ukrainian Public Group to Promote the Implementation of the Helsinki Accords. Copies of the resolution and the letter follow as well as a list of these courageous Ukrainian patriots:

H. CON. RES. 123

Concurrent resolution to seek the resurrection of the national churches in the Ukraine

Whereas the Charter of the United Nations, as well as its Universal Declaration of Human Rights, sets forth the objective of international cooperation "in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion . . . "; and

Whereas in the so-called Brezhnev Constitution of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics article 52 unequivocally provides that "Freedom of conscience, that is, the right to profess any religion and perform religious rites or not profess any religion, and to conduct atheistic propaganda, shall be recognized for all citizens of the United Soviet Socialist Republics. Incitement of hostility and hatred on religious grounds shall be prohibited"; and

Whereas not just religious or civil repression but the genocide—the absolute physical extermination—of both the Ukrainian Orthodox and Catholic Churches in a nation of over fifty million brutally violates the basic civilized rights enunciated above: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of Congress that the President of the United States of America shall take in the name of human rights immediate and determined steps to—

(1) call upon the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to permit the concrete resurrection of both the Ukrainian Orthodox and Catholic Churches in the largest non-Russian nation both within the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and in Eastern Europe; and

(2) utilize formal and informal contacts with Union of Soviet Socialist Republics officials in an effort to secure the freedom of religious worship in places of both churches that their own constitution provides for; and

(3) bring to the attention of all national and international religious councils the nature of this outstanding Stalinist crime and perpetuated violation of basic human rights, with an appropriate address to mobilization of their resources toward the realization of this resolution's objective.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., November 5, 1981.

His Excellency ANATOLY F. DOBRYNIN,
Ambassador of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: We are writing to express our concern about the members of the Ukrainian Public Group to Promote the Implementation of the Helsinki Accords.

This Group was formed five years ago this week. Since that time, virtually all of its members have reportedly been imprisoned, sent to labor camps, or forced into exile.

The Group was created to monitor your government's compliance with the provisions of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. We strongly support the provisions of this Act, and we pledge that our government will continue to abide by them. We are distressed, however, by your government's apparent unwillingness to honor the terms of the act, as demonstrated by the imprisonment and exile of many of the members of this Group.

We have attached a list of the members of the Ukrainian Public Group to Promote Implementation of the Helsinki Accords for your consideration. We urgently request the release of these Soviet citizens, and ask that you convey to Chairman Brezhnev our deep concern about their welfare.

With all good wishes,

Yours sincerely,

FRANK ANNUNZIO,
Member of Congress.

The spirit of the people of Ukraine is testimony to the fact that tyranny, in whatever brutal form it manifests itself, cannot conquer the soul of a Nation and its people.●

LET CONGRESS DO THE LAWMAKING

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. LEVITAS) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, in all the confusion over President Reagan's position on the issue of tax exemptions for private schools, the President did make himself very clear on one point. He clearly reiterated a view he has made known before, that the laws of this country should be made by the Congress—the elected representatives of the people—and not by unelected bureaucrats.

During his campaign for the Presidency, Mr. Reagan pledged his support for the legislative veto, which would give Congress the right to veto rules and regulations promulgated by the bureaucratic agencies. Mr. Reagan realized that the legislative veto would provide a mechanism whereby Congress could have some control over rulemaking by unelected bureaucrats.

And now, it is good to hear President Reagan repeat his opposition to Government "by administrative fiat." The President's statement on January 12, 1982, explaining the Treasury Department's ruling on the tax-exempt status of private schools, underscores his commitment to fight against Government by bureaucrats. President Reagan said:

I am also opposed to administrative agencies exercising powers that the Constitution assigns to the Congress. Such agencies, no matter how well intentioned, cannot be allowed to govern by administrative fiat . . .

President Reagan called this one of the "fundamental" views of his administration.

In a campaign speech in Youngstown, Ohio, on October 8, 1980, Mr. Reagan discussed ways to control the Government bureaucracy. He said:

To better control the growth of Federal regulations, we should . . . grant both Congress and the President greater authority to veto regulations approved by executive agencies.

I agree with Mr. Reagan, and believe that as President he will live up to his campaign promise.

Even though I have heard that some members of the President's staff oppose this idea, given his recent statements, I am sure that President Reagan will keep his word and continue to support the legislative veto, which will return power to those who are elected and accountable to the people of this country. Let us hope he does not let the staff make the decision on this one.●

OMINOUS STEPS TOWARD GOVERNMENT CONTROL OF INFORMATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. BROWN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, in recent weeks we have seen a concerted effort on the part of the administration to impose controls on the free flow of information from the Government to the public, as well as between scientists in the United States and those overseas. This is a most ominous development, with far-reaching implications that I do not believe the administration has fully grasped.

Several actions on the part of the Executive add up to a most worrisome picture. It has been well publicized that new policies are being implemented which will restrict contacts between Government officials and the press. In addition, a new Executive order is being drafted, which will give Government officials greater authority to invoke "national security" to keep information from the public, through the classification procedure. The administration is also moving to rewrite the provisions of the Freedom of Information Act, which has served the Nation so well since its enactment in 1966, in such a way as to restrict both the material that can be made public and those who may demand the information.

Finally, and equally troublesome, are the efforts at restricting the flow of scientific information, by use of the classification procedure, by censorship prior to publication, and by means of regulations based on the authority of the Arms Export and Control Act—administered by the Department of Commerce—and the international traffic in arms regulations—administered by the State Department.

Admiral Inman, Deputy Director of the Central Intelligence Agency, produced at the recent annual meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science a list of subjects for classification or restriction that includes "crop forecasting, computer software, and computer hardware." It is not difficult to see the sweeping range of those proposals. In response to criticisms that the National Security Agency had not made its case for classifying certain cryptographic material, Admiral Inman responded:

This reasoning is circular and unreasonable. The specific details of why information must be protected are often even more damaging than the information itself.

This justification in itself is a brilliant exercise in circular reasoning; it requires that the public place absolute faith and power to control information in the hands of these gentlemen. Admiral Inman then proceeded to characterize scientists' arguments for free flow of information as being motivated by self-interest, entirely disregarding the society's stake in this freedom.

Every new administration inevitably goes through a phase of believing it is more important to stem leaks of sensitive or embarrassing material, rather than dealing with the substance of the issue. While this is understandable, we must remain on guard because this administration, more than any other, stands a good chance of codifying this institutional paranoia into the laws of the land. Once again, we witness the banner of "national security" being raised to justify all manner of restrictions on the free and necessary flow of information. The Nation has grown weary of this demagoguery, especially when the sweepingly broad concept of "national interest" is freely used in place of "national security."

This Nation was founded by individuals who had a healthy distrust for government, based not on ideology but on personal experience of its excesses. In consequence, every effort was made to define rights, responsibilities, and individual restrictions by means of statutes enacted by Congress, so as not to fall victim to the capricious interpretations by faceless bureaucrats or officials with narrow perspectives of the democratic process. I believe this is not in contradiction with the present administration's philosophy.

National security is too important to be left to security specialists alone. Congress and the executive should be especially careful with language in this area, spelling out clearly what is meant by "national security." They must recognize explicitly that information which is merely embarrassing to Government officials does not qualify for being suppressed under the rubric of "national security" or even "national interest."

Quite the contrary, such information is properly a part of the public domain, for without it, the constitutionally mandated system of checks and balances becomes inoperative. The oversight function of Congress was instituted precisely to deal with competing interests, conflicts of policy, inefficiency, waste, and mismanagement. Restrictions on the public dissemination of governmental information inevitably translates into congressional ignorance on key matters, for it is well known that Congress functions by reacting to public concerns, not by initiating public debate. For Congress to acquiesce to the executive's efforts in restricting information is to abdicate its constitutional role.

Beyond the petty issues of embarassing revelations lies the larger question of striking an appropriate balance between the public's right—and need—to know, and genuine concern for national security matters. This is a valid and difficult question. Precisely because of this, it is imperative that the public, through its elected representatives, participate in the process of deciding what it chooses not to know for the sake of the good of the Nation as a whole.

Unfortunately, this administration has failed to recognize the fact that the public's need to know is fundamental to the workings of a democratic nation, and that the press is the vehicle by which this right is exercised. The executive appears to view the press as yet another self-serving special interest group, and the public's need to know as merely a manifestation of an inappropriate curiosity.

Through its actions regarding revisions of the Freedom of Information Act, the new Executive order on classification of sensitive material, its restrictions on contacts with the press, and regulations that restrict communication within the scientific community, the administration is effectively shifting the burden of proof of need to know to the end user, on a case-by-case basis, while at the same time eliminating some of the vehicles by which the user might establish such need. This in itself is prima facie evidence that the administration does not accept the public's need to know as a right. This contradictory situation is further aggravated by the fact that if the public is not aware of the existence of certain important information, it will not know to ask for it through the remaining channels.

Fortunately, the administration's moves toward information control have met with unprecedented resistance. The Washington Post of January 22, 1982, reports vocal protests to the National Security Adviser by reporters who cover the State Department, indicating that the change in policy "is having chilling effects * * * with officials now reluctant to discuss or even explain basic points of policy." Universities find themselves in open confrontation with the Government, refusing to abide by its restrictive regulations regarding meetings with foreign scientists—Los Angeles Times, January 20, 1982. The otherwise staid National Academy of Sciences has refused to act as an intermediary between the universities and the State Department, because it would reflect acceptance of its restrictive policies—Washington Post, January 21, 1982. The Governing Council of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, the Nation's most prestigious scientific society, passed a resolution on January 7, 1982, disapproving of the Government's policies:

Whereas freedom and national security are best preserved by adherence to the principles of openness, that are a fundamental tenet of both the American society and of the scientific process,

Be it resolved that the American Association for the Advancement of Science opposes governmental restrictions on the dissemination, exchange, or availability of unclassified knowledge.

Professional and academic journals are filled with editorials strongly opposing attempts to restrict the flow of scientific information. I wish to call to the attention of my colleagues three such statements, one by Prof. Edward Gerjeoy, from the University of Pittsburgh, who chairs the Panel on Public Affairs of the American Physical Society, another by Prof. Stephen Unger, from Columbia University, and an excellent editorial by Daniel S. Greenberg, the editor and publisher of the Washington based Science & Government Report [editorials appended].

There is another aspect of this question that must not be forgotten: The U.S. leadership in the field of communications and data processing. The United States has held long standing, bipartisan policies aimed at facilitating and preventing restrictions on transnational data flows, which are very important to international trade and to the functioning of many U.S. firms that operate overseas. We have argued strenuously for the benefits of unrestricted data flow, and against the imposition of restrictions on communications, such as through the New World Information Order. The administration's actions regarding the flow of information leaving the United States are in direct contradiction to these longstanding policies, and invite retaliation from other nations which could severely cripple U.S. leadership, trade position, as well as intelligence gathering ability.

For these reasons, it is imperative that Congress not deal with each of the administration's actions in a piecemeal fashion, but be aware of the overall picture they represent. If we were on a war footing, perhaps the measures proposed by the administration might be justifiable for a short interval. But we are not, and the damage and costs that will have to be borne if we accede to the kinds of restrictions envisioned will be far reaching. It is ironic that, in the single-minded pursuit of the anti-Soviet posture that characterizes this administration's policies, we should end up using precisely the same methods of information control for which we so fault them.

UNWISE EXPORT CONTROLS CAN HURT

For the past year and a half the federal government has been increasing its efforts to control the interchange of unclassified scientific and technical information with foreign nationals. These attempts began at the February 1980 International Conference on bubble memory, when the American Vacuum Society was instructed it would have to obtain an export license before admitting Communist-bloc scientists to the meeting; such actions have since become widespread on a variety of scientific fronts. A recent news story in Physics Today (June, page 55) has reviewed these developments. Some idea of their scope—and of the tenor of the government's thinking—can be gleaned from the fact that university physics departments that have admitted mainland Chinese graduate students have been receiving letters from the State Department requesting—under the alleged authority of export regulations—completion of a questionnaire that asks what professional trips the student might be taking, what major subject areas—including specific research problems and experiments—will be involved in the student's program, and what contact the student will have with the host institution's industrial or government contracts.

Preventing the spread of high technology that could make a significant contribution to the military potential of unfriendly nations appears to be the U.S. government's main objective in strengthening export controls. Traditionally the government has accomplished this objective by classifying military "secrets" and by controlling the export of military hardware—aircraft, for example. The new approach extends export controls from military hardware to information about certain high technologies, thereby creating a vast new category of unclassified yet restricted information, open to all American citizens but closed to foreigners without federal authorization. Forbidden are both oral and written communications to foreign nationals.

Without quarreling with the aforementioned objective, American scientists legitimately can question whether the government's new approach can achieve its goal without highly counterproductive and deleterious effects on the current structure of our research institutions, both industrial and academic. Effective enforcement of controls on the newly characterized exports seems impossible without expensive and stultifying expansions of paperwork, bureaucracies and measures that will greatly impede the free exchange of information between our own nationals; these measures will be a source of possible harassment to seminar speakers and university lecturers, and they may endanger the established publication policies of our major scientific journals.

Such measures carry the risk—surely unintended by the government—that our universities and laboratories will decide that much basic research on the frontier of high technology has become too inconvenient and divisive to pursue. It is also likely that American scientific societies will find it awkward to invite distinguished foreign scientists to our conferences and that such scientists, if invited, will refuse to come, all to the detriment of our continued scientific growth. One wonders if the government really understands that the US has no monopoly on high technology, and that during our communications with foreign scholars knowledge is gained by us as well as imparted.

The threats to American science inherent in the new controls may stem from the circumstance that they are being adopted without adequate consultation with the scientific and university communities. The specific queries in the State Department questionnaire suggest only a limited understanding of the facts that American university science departments now have large enrollments of foreign graduate students, that the bulk of these students must be supported on industrial and government contracts, and that after receiving their PhDs many of these foreign students remain in this country and contribute importantly to our nation's scientific and technological growth. It is unlikely that the propounders of the new export control policies—policies which would subject to export licenses any meeting that is not open to the general public and that does not publish its proceedings—are aware of the scientific community's respect for Gordon Conferences or realize that these new policies would make Gordon Conference organizers subject to fine and imprisonment unless they obtained export licenses before admitting foreign nationals.

If increased export controls on scientific and technological information are demonstrably necessary for welfare and security of this nation, the needed regulations should be formulated in active cooperation with working scientists, university administrators and the officers of scientific societies. The government agencies responsible for promulgating and enforcing export controls should attempt to bring the necessary parties together. We hope that the President's new science adviser will lend his support to this suggestion; final promulgation of poorly conceived export control regulations could impede the continued progress of American science and ultimately weaken the United States.

Chairman, Panel on Public Affairs,
American Physical Society.

THE THREAT OF EXPANDING SECRECY IN TECHNOLOGY

(Laws restricting export of technical information are being applied to US university professors and scientists in ways that threaten both academic and scientific research freedom. The following assessment is taken from a background paper prepared for the committee on Scientific Freedom and Responsibility of the American Association for the Advancement of Science.)

(By Stephen Unger)

Historically there have been two types of restrictions placed on scientific and technical information. The government has classified information relevant to military purposes, and the private sector has restricted access to information concerning commercially important processes and devices. The government has also controlled sensitive technical products through weapons and export control regulations.

Over the past few years, however, several governmental actions have been directed at broadening control to include not only the technical hardware but also the technical knowledge generated by private investigators outside the government. Growing government concern is also seen through its efforts to make United States technology in areas such as microelectronics and computer search less accessible to foreign nationals and to impose prior restraint on selected publications.

The growing field of cryptology [secret codes] is a case in point. Cryptology was, until recently, primarily used by the military, intelligence service, and diplomatic corps. However, large-scale digital communications, electronic fund transfers, the storage of huge amounts of data on individuals and businesses in computer banks, and the increased concern about privacy in general, has made cryptology a subject of much broader concern.

On several occasions federal officials have asked that technical papers involving encryption devices not be presented at scientific meetings. Patent applications for these devices have been delayed.

The government's arguments for concealing cryptology work are the open publication would endanger national security.

This has been challenged on the grounds that, because the US is so heavily dependent on electronic communications, a strong civilian capability in encryption and verification systems is necessary to prevent "data sabotage." It is also noted that this technology is much more important to the US than to the Soviet Union, which is far behind in the use of digital data systems.

In early 1980 the organizers of a scientific meeting on computer technology (the American Vacuum Society) and of a meeting on laser fusion (the Optical Society of America and the Institute of Electrical and Electronics Engineers) were asked by the US government to restrict participation of certain invited foreign nationals. Both meetings were held with some government controls imposed.

The US Senate has suggested that foreign students should be prevented from working with certain research programs involving high-speed integrated circuits. The large (probably more than one-third) proportion of engineering, physics, and computer science graduate students at American universities who are foreign nationals would make this restriction difficult, at best.

The constitutional conflicts over the government's right to classify nongovernmental information were well documented in the case of The Progressive, in which a journalist, working from unclassified documents, assembled information on the construction of the H-bomb. In this case, the government sought to classify the result of an independent researcher's work, not the documents used to support that work.

The overriding reason given to support secrecy in these and other areas of science and technology is national security. The military strength of the country has depended in large measure on the pre-eminent status of US technology. Yet, in recent years, fears have been expressed that we cannot continue to disseminate "know how" abroad without further eroding our leadership. Furthermore, America's technological predominance in the commercial sector has been called into question by nations such as Japan and West Germany. Why, proponents of secrecy ask, should sensitive industrial knowledge be exported?

But does secrecy actually promote security? The futility of trying to suppress scientific knowledge is illustrated by what happened in the early 1940s. Prior to the initiation of the Manhattan Project, American scientists agreed not to publish papers dealing with nuclear fission. Intrigued by this absence of publications, G. N. Flyorov, a Soviet physicist, assumed that the US government had begun a secret nuclear project and urged the USSR to do the same.

An argument can be made that secrecy, in the pursuit of high-quality science and technology, does more harm than good.

Virtually all methods for effectively constraining the flow of information out of the country entail the imposition of restrictions on domestic circulation and publication as well. This would make duplication of efforts necessary, thereby slowing the process. Eventually, such a course of action could undermine the national security by weakening the nation technologically.

The exclusion of foreign nationals from university based research would reduce the general pool of talented individuals at American universities. It would also have the more indirect effect of creating a feeling of distrust and ill will between this country and others.

Beyond these considerations is that of the traditional protections for freedom and openness that have always been part of American society and law.

Erecting significant new barriers to scientific communication and establishing precedents with respect to prior constraints on publication and speech would degrade valuable American tradition and detract from the example of openness that this country has set for the rest of the world. It would also harm one of the few existing strands of international cooperation: that which links scientists and engineers across national boundaries.

The threat of expanding secrecy in technology merits the serious attention of scientists and engineers, both as professionals and as citizens.

A FORMULA FOR SMOTHERING U.S. SCIENTIFIC PROGRESS

(By Daniel S. Greenberg)

Are the Soviets really dipping into this country's vast output of scientific and technical knowledge?

No question about it—indeed they are. But there is a serious question concerning what we should do about it. A resolution of that question is becoming more urgent as senior defense and intelligence chiefs intensify demands for important segments of American science to curtain themselves off from prying eyes. If science doesn't voluntarily censor itself, Adm. Bobby R. Inman, deputy director of the Central Intelligence Agency, warned last week, its traditional resistance to "regulation of any kind" will be "wiped away by a tidal wave" of public and congressional concern.

When it comes to pressuring science into trimming its ancient practice of unrestricted communication, the admiral already has a historic scalp in his belt. For it was under his prodding, while he headed the super-secret National Security Agency, that university-based computer scientists agreed to a voluntary system of government pre-publication review of research papers of possible value for making and breaking codes. That reluctantly taken step, even with its voluntary feature, represented an unprecedented surrender in the peacetime history of our scientific community.

Now Inman and his national-security colleagues, backed by the White House, want to extend the principle of voluntary collaboration to most, if not all, of American science and technology. Is that a good idea?

To the tunnel-visioned bureaucrats of national security, it's obviously a splendid idea. But their embrace of it reflects a medieval grasp of the workings of 10th-Century science and technology—so much so that it is reminiscent of perpetual-motion engineering, leech medical therapy and alchemy.

The reason we're ahead of the Soviets in science and technology has nothing to do with expenditures, talent or ambition. In all three departments, the United States and the Soviet Union are lookalikes.

What sets the two countries apart—and makes the United States dynamic and creative and the Soviet Union clumsy and needful of scientific larceny—is that our research is mostly open and theirs is mostly secret. That's the unanimous report from emigres, defectors and foreigners who have visited Soviet research centers. (Incidentally, the only way we got into those carefully guarded centers was through tit-for-tat exchange programs that we've foolishly cut off in retaliation for Soviet foreign transgressions.)

Inman's latest proposal rates special attention both because of his government position and his track record on clamping down on science. What he's asking for sounds innocent enough, amounting to the seemingly friendly suggestion that researchers police themselves before an outraged public does it for them, and with more onerous restrictions than might be really necessary and desirable. "A potential balance between national security and science may lie," he told the annual meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, "in an agreement to include in the peer-review process, prior to the start of research and prior to the publication, the question of potential harm to the nation."

The difficulty with that smooth-sounding formula is that it would be a first step to the intellectual coagulation of American science through the introduction of spook criteria into the support and publication of research.

Though the admiral says he's mainly concerned about industrially applied research rather than academic basic science, the fact is that the peer-review process that he's focusing on is almost wholly confined to science in the universities. The peers are knowledgeable fellow scientists who advise on handing out federal research money and on worthiness for publishing the results. In that realm of research, his recommendations would indeed end the problem of Soviet prying by so retarding our scientific output that the Russians would find little worth lifting from journals and conferences.

But are there advanced technologies, in the form of equipment or information, that we want to keep out of the hands of adversaries? Of course. And security techniques exist for accomplishing that without stopping up the mainsprings of our scientific creativity. The classification of militarily relevant technology is old hat, and we've learned to live with it—though it's worth noting that many enlightened military men think it's overdone to our detriment.

Knowledge thrives on light and air. That's the one secret of American science that the Soviets are unable to grasp.●

LEGISLATION TO INCREASE THE CIGARETTE EXCISE TAX AND EARMARK THE REVENUE TO MEDICARE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. STARK) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, today on behalf of myself and the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. OBERSTAR, I am introducing a bill to increase the excise tax on cigarettes by 10 cents, and to transfer the revenues from this tax to medicare. On the Senate side, Senator DANFORTH has introduced identical legislation, S. 1610.

A major objective of this bill is to help make those who choose to smoke responsible for the tremendous health care costs now borne for them by the Federal Government and the nonsmoking taxpayers. Experts estimate that in 1980 alone, a staggering $3.8 billion or about 6 percent of medicare and medicaid expenditures, went to treat persons suffering from smoking-related diseases. Presently, the Federal excise tax of 8 cents per package, first imposed in 1951 and left unchanged in the intervening 30 years, goes into the General Treasury. Thus, the current 8-cent tax revenue is only very indirectly being applied to the costs attributable directly to cigarette smoking. If the additional 10-cent tax is earmarked to medicare, however, this would raise over $3 billion per year for medicare.

A 10-cent excise tax increase would also help decrease cigarette consumption. Reducing consumption would benefit not only the health of Americans, but also our troubled economy. Considering that the value of production lost through sickness due to smoking in 1980 was $25.8 billion, an increase in the excise tax on cigarettes would help productivity.

While proposing tax increases is not popular, I believe that in this case it is altogether warranted and timely. My bill makes smokers pay a larger share of the clearly identified costs they impose on society, and it also brings needed financial help to a very troubled social security system. This bill is not a way for President Reagan to avoid responsibility for projected deficits, exceeding $100 billion in the coming years. The President must recognize that future deficits were largely created by the excessive $749 billion tax cut he pushed through Congress last year. My bill is, however, a way of dealing with a national health disaster created by cigarette smoking.

I hope that my colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee will thoughtfully consider this legislation in the near future.●

THE CREATION OF A NATIONAL "BULLET TRAIN" SYSTEM

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. REUSS) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, with the beginning of this 2d session of the 97th Congress, I report on the progress realized last session toward achieving a high-speed passenger rail system in the United States equal to or better than those in the other industrialized nations.

Because the creation of a national "bullet train" system would have a beneficial effect on the U.S. economy, it has been a top priority of the Joint Economic Committee. In its November 3, 1981, report, "Case Studies in Private/Public Cooperation To Revitalize America: Passenger Rail," the committee concluded:

One part of America's infrastructure should be a high-speed rail passenger system. The Europeans and Japanese have demonstrated that high-speed rail passenger operations can be successful. This success can be duplicated in the United States. As personal travel becomes more difficult and inconvenient, passenger rail systems emerge as a viable and intelligent alternative to present personal transportation systems.

The development of a high-speed passenger rail system in the United States would have benefits that extend far beyond saving energy and improving personal transportation. Revitalizing the Nation's passenger railroads would provide an excellent start in reindustrializing America because it would require the creation of a major industry. For the next generation, Americans could be busy making rail locomotives and rolling stock, new track, electrification systems, and other things needed to redevelop our entire rail system. Just as the automobile helped make the 1920's prosperous, the decade of the 1980's could see an American revival based on the railroad.

Given the benefits which would accrue from the development of a passenger rail system, the United States should establish a goal of creating a high-speed rail passenger system equal to or better than those of the other industrialized nations. The development of a passenger rail system in the United States should not be a revivalist or preservationist movement. The American system should be a railroad of the future based on modern technology and new ideas.

The committee's eight specific recommendations included:

First. Develop high-speed intercity rail systems in highly populated corridors;

Second. Separate passenger and freight operations;

Third. Utilize advanced railroad technology;

Fourth. Electrify the rail lines;

Fifth. Eliminate grade crossings;

Sixth. Business, labor, and Government should cooperate in project planning, finance, and operations;

Seventh. Appoint a Rail Corridor Development Expediter in the Executive Office of the President; and Eighth. Promote domestic jobs and production.

Editorial response to the Joint Economic Committee report was favorable:

[From the Tucson (Ariz.) Arizona Daily Star, Nov. 6, 1981]

ALL ABOARD AGAIN

At last! The congressional Joint Economic Committee has lighted a green semaphore on the development of high-speed passenger trains for Americans. The attention is a little late, but a free market is like that sometimes.

While the governments of other nations have devoted increasing attention to rail transportation since World War II, the United States has let its once superior service slide into near-oblivion. Affluent Americans were more enamored of the personal-automobile and faster, larger jet planes.

But inflation has put those modes out of reach to many. Airlines are in financial trouble and government supervision of air traffic is a mess. The price of a new automobile is nearly out of sight and the fuel that runs it is no bargain, either; the auto industry is in deep recession. Meanwhile, tax-strapped Americans have put the squeeze on government spending at all levels. The pell-mell construction of interstate highways and inner-city freeways has all but stopped, and many of those built in better times are falling into disrepair. Economists don't foresee any change in the near future.

So the public eye is turning back toward the rails. Amtrak, the government-supported rail passenger system, has kept the option alive. It has worked against tremendous odds—a lack of cooperation from most private railroads, legislators who refuse to see the need for it, and an apathetic public.

In its early years, Amtrak was appealing to few but passenger train loyalists. The equipment was old and in poor condition, schedules were abysmal, the trains unreasonably slow and reservations difficult to get. Today the Amtrak fleet consists of more luxurious new coaches than old ones. Its on-time record beats that of the airlines. This month, Amtrak switched to a totally computerized reservations system that will make bookings a snap.

Still, the trains are slow. Amtrak runs over private lines, many of which are not maintained to carry high-speed traffic. Partly because of that and partly because of railroad hostility toward Amtrak, passenger trains are held to average speeds of 40 mph. Meanwhile, "bullet trains" in Japan, England's "High Speed Train" and French "Tres Grande Vitesse" trains whisk passengers between cities at speeds of 100 mph and more.

Amtrak has had notable success with higher-than-average speed service between Boston, New York and Washington and between San Diego and Los Angeles. Amtrak President Alan Boyd believes that high-speed service between major cities from 100 to 300 miles apart would be very successful. Phoenix and Tucson come to mind almost immediately. The technology and the equipment are available—mostly from Japan. It will take American industry longer to go into production. And it will take billions of dollars.

The Joint Economic Committee did not recommend that government foot the bill, but rather that private capital be raised through government-guaranteed loans—such as those offered the Chrysler Corp. That's a sensible way to go. Railroad companies could be the first to queue up for a piece of the action, guaranteeing also that they will be more helpful in making Amtrak work.

The idea is not to replace the jet plane or the personal automobile but to balance the nation's transportation system with an efficient third mode and thus assure that the United States remains mobile.

[From the Houston (Tex.) Chronicle, Nov. 9, 1981]

TEXAS TRIANGLE PERFECT FOR HIGH SPEED TRAINS

Unfastening the golden buckle of the Sun Belt to get in and out of Houston is getting tougher each day. Crowded skies and freeways make travel between major cities in Texas expensive in irritation and time. Talk of high speed trains in the Texas Triangle corridor of Houston-San Antonio-Dallas to ease these intercity traffic jams has been going on for several years.

Last week a Joint Economic Committee of Congress released a study calling for construction and operation of a high speed passenger rail system nationwide. The committee believes such a system could play a vital role in revising America's economic decline.

The phenomenal industrial and population growth in the Texas Triangle makes it a perfect candidate for such a system. If a high speed rail system can succeed anywhere, it is in the Houston-San Antonio-Dallas booming economy. Previous attempts at profitable passenger train operations out of Houston have failed because they have not linked these three major population areas with convenient, reliable speedy and direct service.

Alan Boyd, president of Amtrak, noted that its passenger train from Houston to Dallas—now canceled—traveled 345 miles to make a 245 mile trip. It took 8 hours and 50 minutes to do it, an average speed of 38 miles per hour. A business person would not consider taking time for such a trip. Even a pleasure traveler would find eight hours on a train to Dallas a bit taxing.

Finding a solution to such a convoluted system requires looking to those countries that have good rail systems. Fortunately, we are making progress in that direction. A newly formed Japan-United States Rail Congress, comprised of 15 members of the Japanese Diet and 15 members of the U.S. Congress, is working to bring high-speed trains to this country. Government incentives in the form of loan guarantees and tax credits could encourage private investment.

Restoring train travel as a major form of transportation is not only economically sound but psychologically rewarding. Americans have long been fascinated by train travel. It's in their folklore and music. Maybe with highspeed trains, romanticism and reality can be reconciled.

[From the Cocoa (Fla.) Today, Nov. 8, 1981]

BULLET-TRAIN ADVOCATES ARE ON THE RIGHT TRACK

The passenger train is a good idea whose time has come and gone and come back again. What lies ahead is the challenge of rebuilding America's rail system, a task more formidable than its original construction early in the last century.

It has been more than a decade since Brevard County residents have been able to board a train in Titusville, Cocoa or Melbourne. The story is the same across the nation: cheap fuel for automobiles, good roads and relatively inexpensive air travel pushed railroads out of the passenger hauling business.

The passenger lines that remain are operated by Amtrak, the federal rail corporation that is so awash in red ink it could repaint all its locomotives with the stuff and still have enough left over to touch up a caboose.

Now that fuel costs have risen sharply, trains are beginning to appear very attractive again. But before they can stage a comeback they must overcome their major drawback—their lack of speed. In the mid-1950s the average passenger train traveled at 75 mph. Now the average is 40 mph. That won't do. We Americans want everything now, and that includes getting to where we're going.

In some other countries the speed problem has been licked. Specially designed trains hurdle between cities at well above 100 mph. Japan pioneered the concept of "bullet-trains," but France has the fastest train of all—the Tres Grande Vitesse, which cruises at 160 mph and will go much faster when its special tracks are completed. West Germany, Sweden, Switzerland, Italy and Canada either now operate high-speed rail systems or are in the process of building them.

Obviously, the United States is sadly behind in this area, and it's time we caught up. Recently the Joint Economic Committee of the U.S. Congress issued a report to that effect. "The construction and operation of a high-speed passenger rail system could play a vital role in reversing America's economic decline," the study concluded.

The report comes even as Japanese and American experts are cooperating in studying the feasibility of setting up bullet-train service in several areas in the United States. One of the routes under consideration is that between Miami and Jacksonville, which obviously would have tremendous economic implications for the Space Coast.

It is not too early for state and local officials to get behind the bullet-train concept. Their support will be needed if such an ambitious project is to become a reality.

[From the Dallas (Tex.) Times-Herald, Nov. 8, 1981]

SLOW PROGRESS FOR FAST TRAIN

A report by the Joint Economic Committee of Congress paints a beautiful picture of bullet trains racing between major American cities, but the dream is clouded by the economic realities that have forced sharp cutbacks in existing passenger service provided by the federal Amtrak system.

The time will come when high energy costs and congested skies and airports will make it more feasible to consider a network of high-speed trains, but that day may be decades away.

Included in the list of cities suggested for bullet-train service are four in Texas—Dallas, Fort Worth, San Antonio and Houston.

The rail enthusiasts on the congressional committee said the United States needs a balanced transportation system to remain economically healthy. The construction and operation of a high-speed passenger rail system could play a vital role in reversing America's economic decline, the group reported.

Bullet trains that average at least 100 miles per hour now are in service in Britain, France and Japan, but they are part of government-owned-and-subsidized systems. President Reagan is going the opposite direction in transportation policy, calling for less, not more, spending on railroads, aviation, barge operations and highway construction.

Amtrak supporters argue that the passenger system would come closer to paying its way if it had better track facilities and higher speeds. The report on the bullet-train concept noted that the average speed of U.S. passenger trains declined from 75 miles per hour in the mid-1950s to 40 miles per hour at present.

We certainly agree with the congressional committee that bullet-train service ought to be explored. For although financing the project without massive government subsidies would be a major obstacle, the train network would, as the committee noted, not only create a major new industry and foster new employment and business opportunities, but also would help revitalize the areas served by the high-speed trains.

Meanwhile, legislators from the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives and the Japanese Diet successfully formed the Japan-United States Rail Congress, which will work to introduce high-speed passenger rail systems in heavily populated U.S.-transportation corridors. The Rail Congress held its first meeting in Washington on November 4, 1981, and passed the following resolution:

RESOLUTION CREATING THE JAPAN-UNITED STATES RAIL CONGRESS

Whereas the United States and Japan have historically been among the world leaders in the development of rail transportation systems; and

Whereas rising energy prices and uncertain energy supply, the limits of the carrying capacity of other modes of transportation, and the natural competitive advantages and efficiencies of rail transportation make railroads an increasingly important part of the transportation systems of both the United States and Japan; and

Whereas much is to be gained by the discussion of and resolution of problems related to railroad transportation in the two countries; and

Whereas the position of Japan as world leader in developing and operating efficient, safe, and reliable high-speed intercity passenger trains and commuter rail trains can be of assistance in developing and enhancing such services in the United States; and

Whereas the position of the United States as the leader in innovation and operation of freight rail systems, computer systems, aircraft technology, and other fields related to transportation can be of assistance as Japan seeks to meet its growing needs; and therefore before it

Resolved, That a permanent forum composed of members of the Japanese Diet and the United States Congress should be and hereby is created to promote the discussion of and resolution of matters of common interest in the area of rail transportation. This new group shall be known as the Japan-United States Rail Congress. The Japan-United States Rail Congress, as one of its important tasks, will work diligently so that the benefits to be gained by solving problems through international discussions between both countries can be shared evenly and broadly by the leaders of both countries. For that purpose, in the event that a conference with comparable interests is organized by private sector leaders of both countries, this rail congress will study the matter of convening a joint meeting as necessity dictates. The Japan-United States Rail Congress supports the study now underway by Japanese specialists investigating the economic and engineering feasibility of high-speed rail systems in the United States.

Japan-United States Rail Congress takes further cognizance of the contributions being made to the improvement of rail transportation in the United States through the implementation of the government-to-government agreement in order to assist any implementation of the Northeast Corridor Improvement Project. It is the strong hope that the useful work under this government-to-government program will continue.

It shall be the goal of the Japan-United States Rail Congress to meet at least once each year, with the United States and Japan serving as host and secretariat in alternating years. Accordingly, the Japan-United States Rail Congress agrees to reconvene in Japan in the Summer of 1982, with the meeting coinciding with the opening ceremonies of the new Tohoku Shinkansen.

It is the hope and expectation of the members of the Japan-United States Rail Congress that the formation of this new group will contribute to the further enhancement of the friendship and close cooperation of our two countries.

Negotiations are presently underway toward creating a similar Rail Congress between the United States and France. The French high-speed TGV passenger train serving Paris-Lyons began operation last September.

Finally, the conference report on the Department of Transportation appropriations for 1982 (Public Law 97-102), signed into law by President Reagan on December 23, 1981, included the following language in the statement of managers:

The conferees support the formation of the Japan-United States Rail Congress by legislators from the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives and the Japanese Diet. This bilateral Congress proposes to introduce a system of high-speed passenger trains in this nation's heavily populated transportation corridors and with it to create jobs for the construction and operation of the system and the manufacture of equipment. The conferees believe that high-speed passenger train service in Japan, France and elsewhere demonstrates that it can be financially self-supporting and that adequate private capital can be made available. The conferees congratulate the Joint Economic Committee and Science and Technology Committee for their support of new technology and improved rail transportation.

The conferees direct the Executive Branch, including the Department of Transportation and its Federal Railroad Administration, to prepare in conjunction with Amtrak a report to Congress planning the creation of an American high-speed passenger rail system. The FRA and Amtrak are specifically directed to determine the feasibility of high-speed corridor operation between Los Angeles and San Diego, Orlando and Miami, Chicago and Detroit, Chicago and Milwaukee, and Chicago and Cincinnati via Indianapolis (along Interstate right-of-way).

Thus a U.S. high-speed passenger rail system received strong impetus in 1981. With increasing public and legislative interest, and the growing realization that a balanced transportation system is vital to our Nation's future, I hope that this momentum will continue in 1982.●

WASHINGTON REPORT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. LEACH) is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. LEACH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the No. 1 issue facing the Nation in 1982 is jobs.

The Reagan administration's cutback in Federal spending on social programs and public sector employment can only be justified if the private sector picks up the slack and provides more jobs for more people.

Yet in recent months unemployment has steadily risen. Without increased demand for goods and services, the President's tax and spending programs are in jeopardy.

In retrospect, it would appear that too great an emphasis on either supply-side or demand economics leads to imbalances in the economy and that the Tax Act of 1981 was slanted a bit too much toward supply-side incentives. Accordingly, new demand-oriented consumer incentives are needed to give the economy a short-term shot in the arm to allow the longer term supply-side program a chance to work. It simply does not make sense to provide companies incentives to expand if there is no demand for their products.

Moreover, a careful review of several provisions of the 1981 Tax Act raises questions about tax equity as well as economic priorities. For example, the social case for providing new tax incentives for the petroleum industry, which is capital- rather than labor-intensive, demands review.

As chairman of the newly created House Republican task force on job creation, I am introducing legislation today to give the economy's job-intensive industries a powerful boost. Specifically aimed at spurring the stricken automobile, housing, and farm implement industries, the measure calls for the creation of three new tax incentives:

First, a $750 tax credit—which is equivalent to a $1,500 tax deduction for a family at the 50-percent tax bracket or a $3,000 tax deduction for a family at the 25-percent tax bracket—for individuals purchasing a new car in 1982;

Second, a tax credit of up to $5,000 for families purchasing a newly constructed home in 1982; and

Third, an extra 10-percent tax credit up to $5,000 for the purchase of new farm equipment this year.

Adoption of these proposals will entail a cost to the Treasury, but this cost can be more than offset by plugging several of the corporate welfare loopholes Congress created in the 1981 Tax Act. The provision, for example, which allows companies which lose money to sell through intricate leasing arrangements their tax losses to profitmaking enterprises should be eliminated, as should the reduction Congress authorized in the windfall profit tax on oil companies.

The leasing provisions of the 1981 Tax Act represent a particularly outrageous assault on the tax codes. To reward the inefficient by allowing companies which lose money to sell their tax losses is to stultify the economy and shift an unfair amount of the burden of funding Government from Wall Street to Main Street. Big business is the sole beneficiary of the leasing provisions, to the competitive disadvantage of small business and at the expense of the individual taxpayer.

The recently enacted reduction in the windfall profit tax on the oil industry—particularly in light of the recent merger mania in the industry—can only be termed unconscionable. There is simply no industry which deserves a tax break less today than big oil.

Hopefully the tradeoffs involved in the jobs creation package introduced this week will provide persuasive arguments for Members to adopt a corrective rather than radical approach to tax revision. The alternative, I fear, to corrective legislation is either intransigence on an imperfect tax policy or return to the big tax policies of the 1970's.

The institution of incentives to employment in distressed industries implies a change of emphasis from corporate welfare to consumer concern. It also implies a shift in emphasis from the nonlabor-intensive oil industry to the job-intensive sector of economic production in the Midwest and Northeast. Such a shift is clearly called for when over 400,000 people are out or work in the auto industry and the even more labor-intensive construction industry is at its lowest level since 1946.

In addition we have a profound national interest in stimulating purchases of new automobiles. The current generation of cars marks a quantum improvement in gasoline mileage standards and thus a significant step toward energy independence. Moreover, given the fact that the Government has guaranteed massive loans to one auto maker, a return to profitability in the industries could result in sizable savings of public funds.

It is time for Congress to look at the job losses piling up in basic American industries and turn its attention to helping the UAW assembly line worker instead of the oil company executive.

It is also time for the Justice Department to reembrace the Teddy Roosevelt tradition of forceful antitrust enforcement. The Reagan economic program will be jeopardized if big business is allowed to use its newly given tax breaks to rearrange corporate ownership instead of creating new jobs and increasing productivity. Antitrust policy should take into consideration the effect of mergers on jobs creation as well as industrial concentration.

If American business is to preserve the tax incentives Congress has provided, an economic and social commitment must be made to building rather than buying, expanding industries rather than concentrating stock ownership, jobs creation rather than elimination.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

STATE OF THE JUDICIARY

HON. ROBERT A. YOUNG
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. YOUNG of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to share with my colleagues the state of the judiciary address recently delivered by Chief Justice Robert T. Donnelly of the Missouri Supreme Court before the 81st Missouri General Assembly gathered in joint session on January 7, 1982. Mr. Speaker, I am particularly pleased to recognize Chief Justice Donnelly because of his long and distinguished career of public service. Robert True Donnelly is a native of Lebanon, Mo. He served in the infantry in World War II. After the war he attended the University of Missouri where he received his law degree. He was admitted to the Missouri bar on December 10, 1949. He was appointed to the Supreme Court of Missouri in 1965, and has served in that capacity ever since. He has also served as a member of the board of governors of the Missouri bar and as deputy chairman at the Conference of Chief Justices.

In his address, Mr. Chief Justice Donnelly makes a strong case for judicial restraint. This is a position he has articulated time and time again in his work on the Missouri Supreme Court. In the present atmosphere of judicial expansionism, he offers a note of clarity and principle. He gives an eloquent vision of the role of the judicial branch of Government and the future of our country and I insert his address to be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and be made a part of the RECORD thereof:

THE STATE OF THE JUDICIARY IN MISSOURI—1982

Your Excellency, Mr. President, Mr. Speaker, Members of the 81st General Assembly, Ladies and Gentlemen: I perceive the coming period of our nation's history as one which will sorely test the strength and integrity of our system of government, and I am impelled to speak of my concern. As was eloquently said in different context, my effort "may be a quixotic tilt at windmills which belittles great principles of liberty. Only time can tell." However, I must say to you what I believe. Of course, it must also be said that the views I express are not necessarily shared by the other judges of the Supreme Court of Missouri.

My area of concern, of course, is the state judiciary in Missouri. I regret that I cannot speak honestly of the condition of the state judiciary without openly discussing the turf now occupied by the judiciary of our national government and without addressing the constitutional legitimacy of its claim.

I will use the word subjectivism many times today. As I use the word, the doctrine of subjectivism would legitimate the use by a judge of his individual feeling as the standard by which he would decide constitutional questions. I hope my distate for subjectivism will be evident by the time I finish.

Today, as perhaps never before, there is great public concern about the impact of "government" on our lives. We are in the midst of a period when even the President of the United States speaks out at every opportunity against too much government in Washington. I do not intend to influence you one way or another on that question. The point I would hope to make is that the essence of the relationship between our people and their government is that the people, not the government, are sovereign. Officials of government can rightfully exercise only such powers as the people freely give them. Their assertions of power are of no legal or conceptual validity if made without the consent of the people.

How does this impact on the state judiciary of Missouri?

In 1965, when I first became a judge of the Supreme Court of Missouri, I swore that I would support the Constitution of the United States. In so doing, did I also bind myself to follow the latest pronouncement made by a majority of the justices of the United States Supreme Court on a given question as if such pronouncement equates with the express language of the United States Constitution?

Article VI of the United States Constitution provides in part:

"This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of the State to the Contrary notwithstanding."

Of course, if a case ruled upon by the Supreme Court of Missouri is reviewed and ruled upon by the United States Supreme Court, the latter ruling is "the law of the case" and must be followed.

However, if a case ruled upon by the Supreme Court of Illinois is reviewed by the United States Supreme Court and an opinion is handed down by the United States Supreme Court, is that opinion "the supreme Law of the Land" and, therefore, binding on me in Missouri when I am confronted with a similar situation? Are decisions of the United States Supreme Court "the supreme Law of the Land" prescribed in Article VI of the United States Constitution?

For many years members of the federal judiciary have injected federal control into almost every facet of the lives of our citizens. Although bound, by oath or affirmation, to support all of the Constitution of the United States, they have excised the tenth original amendment. Their arrogations are a matter of record. They boast of routinely engaging in "bureaucratic and administrative functions, such as overseeing [state] schools, [state] mental hospitals, and [state] prisons." They refuse to recognize the ultimate questions: Shall judges be restricted to the exercise of those powers which derive "from the consent of the governed"?

In 1905, the United States Supreme Court, in Lochner v. New York, struck down a state statute which provided that no employees should be required or permitted to work in bakeries more than sixty hours in a week, or ten hours a day, holding that such statute was an unreasonable, unnecessary and arbitrary interference with the right of an individual to contract. Mr. Justice Holmes had the following to say in dissent:

It is settled by various decisions of this court that state constitutions and state laws may regulate life in many ways which we as legislators might think as injudicious or if you like as tyrannical as this, and which equally with this interfere with the liberty to contract, * * *. Some of these laws embody convictions or prejudices which judges are likely to share. Some may not. But a constitution is not intended to embody a particular economic theory, whether of paternalism and the organic relation of the citizen to the State of laissez faire. It is made for people of fundamentally differing views, and the accident of our finding certain opinions natural and familiar or novel and even shocking ought not to conclude our judgment upon the question whether statutes embodying them conflict with the Constitution of the United States."

In a period of several years before and after the decision in Lochner, the United States Supreme Court, under the mantle of "substantive due process," rather routinely struck down state legislative enactments. This period has come to be known as the Lochner Era, and was referred to in the case of Ferguson v. Skrupa, as follows:

"The doctrine that prevailed in Lochner, * * * and like cases—that due process authorizes courts to hold laws unconstitutional when they believe the legislature has acted unwisely—has long since been discarded. We have returned to the original constitutional proposition that courts do not substitute their social and economic beliefs for the judgment of legislative bodies, who are elected to pass laws."

Of course, the Ferguson, prognosis were erroneous. The books are bulging with Lochnerian "substitutions." Mention of a few will suffice.

In April 1969, in Shapiro v. Thompson, the Court struck down state statutes requiring one year's residence prior to receiving welfare benefits, holding that because this requirement impinged on the "constitutionally guaranteed right of interstate travel," it was to be judged by the standard of whether it promoted a compelling state interest.

In January 1973, in Roe v. Wade, the Court struck down a Texas abortion statute, holding that the statute infringed on a pregnant woman's right of privacy, in the opinion of the Court could not be justified by a compelling state interest, and, therefore, violated the due process clause. The Court then proceeded to declare, by trimesters of pregnancy, the interests of a state which the Court considers "compelling."

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

The problem posed is that the compelling state interest standard requires a judicial evaluation which is subjective in nature and which requires that a judge decide whether "the legislature has acted unwisely." As noted by Mr. Justice Rehnquist, "the compelling state interest standard will inevitably require [courts] to examine * * * legislative policies and pass on the wisdom of these policies in the very process of deciding whether a particular state interest put forward may or may not be 'compelling.'"

In Duncan v. Louisiana, the Court held that the sixth amendment right to trial by jury applies to state criminal prosecutions, and cited with approval a study which had concluded "that juries do understand the evidence and come to sound conclusions in most of the cases presented to them and that when juries differ with the result at which the judge would have arrived, it is usually because they are serving some of the very purposes for which they were created and for which they are now employed."

In Jackson v. Virginia, the Supreme Court rejected the presumption that trial juries will act rationally and held "that in a challenge to a state criminal conviction brought under 28 U.S.C. § 2254 * * * the applicant is entitled to habeas corpus relief if it is found that upon the record evidence adduced at the trial no rational trier of fact could have found proof of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt." Despite the Court's disclaimers, history teaches us in Missouri that the Court's use of the word "rational" gives a federal court carte blanche to substitute its view of guilt or innocence for that of the trial jury.

In 1969, in State v. Brizendine, I was joined by four of my brothers in stating: "This opinion is filed in the records of this Court because the people of Missouri are entitled to know that the effect of this [Federal] statute, as evidenced by the action of the Federal judiciary in this case, is to make this Court subservient to the trial courts of the Federal judicial system in cases involving violations of the criminal laws of this State." It is enough to say that the Brizendine prediction has proved alarmingly accurate.

Why does the Court persist in injecting the federal judiciary into the administration of justice in the states?

It has been suggested that the Court's "assault upon the legal order by moral imperatives" may have contributed to the excesses of the Nixon Presidency and Watergate. The suggestion may be accurate. It is a fact that at some point in time after World War II the Supreme Court of the United States ceased to function only as a court. It molded itself into an organ for control of social policy and made that policy effectual by utilization of the fourteenth amendment to amend the Constitution according to the predilections of its majority. I have no right to question the good faith of its majority or its desire "to do good things." I do question the wisdom of its derogating "the rule of law" as a viable concept and its creating a climate in which the leaders of another department of government could come to believe that there are no legal limits to the exercise of arbitrary power and no ultimate responsibility to the governed.

In any event, the United States Supreme Court "dropped the other shoe" in 1979. The Court made it clear, in North Carolina v. Butler, that state courts are not permitted to entertain interpretations of the United States Constitution which vary from rulings of the United States Supreme Court. How could this have happened in America? If you are curious, you can find the answer in Eric Hoffer's "The True Believer."

In my view, the Constitution of the United States sets the outer limits of the powers delegated by the people to their agents in the legislative department, the executive department, and the judicial department of the federal government. I find support for this view in the Preamble to the Constitution of the United States and in the Declaration of Independence which declares, as I read it, that even members of the judicial department may exercise only those powers which derive "from the consent of the governed."

History tells us that the Framers, in establishing a federal government, were influenced by the teachings of Locke, Rousseau, and others, and by the social concept they espoused. This concept would recognize a continuing right in the people to call their agents, even the United States Supreme Court, to account. It would assure that the people, and not an agency of government, will determine the direction of their lives. If, in fact, the United States Supreme Court is exercising powers without the consent of the governed—the people—then the rights it purports to secure in their name are counterfeit—its benevolence a fraud.

Where, then, do we find a delegation of power by the people to the United States Supreme Court to declare "the supreme Law of the Land" under Article VI of the United States Constitution? Where do we find "the consent of the governed"?

There is nothing in the Constitution itself which could be construed as conferring power, express or implied, in the Court to declare "the supreme Law of the Land."

In Cooper v. Aaron, the Court asserted:

"Article VI of the Constitution makes the Constitution the 'supreme Law of the Land.' In 1803, Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for a unanimous Court, referring to the Constitution as 'the fundamental and paramount law of the nation,' declared in the notable case of Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch 137, 177, that 'It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is.' This decision declared the basic principle that the federal judiciary is supreme in the exposition of the law of the Constitution, and that principle has ever since been respected by this Court and the Country as a permanent and indispensable feature of our constitutional system. It follows that the interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment enunciated by this Court in the Brown case is the supreme law of the land, and Art. VI of the Constitution makes it of binding effect on the States 'any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any state to the Contrary notwithstanding.'"

I think it must be said that Mr. Justice Brennan, in drafting the opinion in Cooper, may have painted with the broadest brush ever used in analytical jurisprudence. If it was his purpose to premise consent of the people upon their failure to anticipate the unltimate misuse of Marshall's dictum in Marbury, he excised the most turbulent and traumatic period in the history of our nation. In Scott v. Sandford, the Supreme Court held that Dred Scott, "a negro, whose ancestors were imported into this country, and sold as slaves, [could not] become a member of the political community formed and brought into existence by the Constitution of the United States, and as such become entitled to all the rights, and privileges, and immunities, guaranteed by that instrument to the citizen."

In the debates with Senator Douglas in 1858, Abraham Lincoln repeatedly stated his distaste for the Dred Scott decision and his refusal to follow it. And, in his first Inaugural Address, March 4, 1861, he articulated his preception of the role of the United States Supreme Court:

"I do not forget the position assumed by some, that constitutional questions are to be decided by the Supreme Court; nor do I deny that such decisions must be binding, in any case, upon the parties to a suit, as to the object of that suit, while they are also entitled to very high respect and consideration in all paralled cases by all other departments of the government. And while it is obviously possible that such decision may be erroneous in any given case, still the evil effect following it, being limited to that particular case, with the chance that it may be overruled and never become a precedent for other cases, can better be borne than would the evils of a different practice. At the same time, the candid citizen must confess that if the policy of the government, upon vital questions affecting the whole people, is to be irrevocably fixed by decisions of the Supreme Court, the instant they are made, in ordinary litigation between parties in personal actions, the people will have ceased to be their own rulers, having to that extent practically resigned the government into the hands of that eminent tribunal."

I believe the Lincoln statement is as appropriate today as it was in 1861. The Cooper assertion is an arrogation.

I take no personal pleasure in noting publicly the propensities of the department of government which Hamilton predicted "will always be the least dangerous to the political rights of the Constituton * * *." However, in my view, the academicians, the media and other molders of public opinion in America prostitute their talents when, for whatever reason, they persist in tolerating "arrogations" by calling them "interpretations." I profoundly respect the United States Supreme Court as an institution. However, even the United States Supreme Court should not be permitted to wield power it was never given. Mr. Justice Black said it best:

"I realize that many good and able men have eloquently spoken and written, sometimes in rhapsodical strains, about the duty of this Court to keep the Constitution in tune with the times. The idea is that the Constitution must be changed from time to time and that this Court is charged with a duty to make those changes. For myself, I must with all deference reject that philosophy. The Constitution makers knew the need for change and provided for it. Amendments suggested by the people's elected representatives can be submitted to the people or their selected agents for ratification. That method of change was good for our Fathers, and being somewhat old-fashioned I must add it is good enough for me."

No doubt, the veteran legislators among you have found my remarks this morning different from those contained in the State of the Judiciary addresses I delivered when you honored me many years ago as the first Chief Justice of Missouri to address the General Assembly of Missouri. A multitude of practical problems within the judicial department deserve your attention. But years of experience have taught us that the Missouri General Assembly will respond reasonably to our needs.

Today, I have felt compelled to set aside a discussion of those needs for the moment and to attempt to persuade you that an insidious disease exists in our nation. The greed for power has surfaced from time to time in all civilizations. The uniqueness of our present concern is that the disease has cropped out among judges, where one would least expect it.

My cousin, David, his father, and I have served this state, in its public offices, for nearly a century. You know I am no demagogue. I have no taste for courthouse-door confrontations. But those who would arrogate power for themselves by reliance upon self-serving substanceless declarations (whether made by Marshall or Brennan) need to be reminded that a deliberate course of action, which would effectually transfer determinations of public polity from the people, or their elected representatives in the Congress and in the legislatures of the states, to judicial elites is not "good behavior."

In the hill country where I come from, I suspect what I have said to you today would be characterized as attempting to get your attention by hitting you between the eyes with an ax handle. Missourians are a proud people. We, and our sons, have fought in four wars alongside brothers from other states because we love America. We wish to preserve its promise.

Thank you very much.●

GUNDERSON LEGISLATION TO LIMIT CASEIN IMPORTS

HON. STEVE GUNDERSON

OF WISCONSIN

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, on November 9, 1981, the International Trade Commission held hearings on the question of whether to limit casein imports under section 22 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. This section of the law permits the President to establish quantitative limitations on imports if those imports interfere with or threaten to interfere with the effective operation of a domestic price support program.

The purpose of section 22, as noted by the ITC General Counsel, is "to insure, among other things, that the price support programs are not undercut or made more expensive by imported goods."

Last Tuesday, January 19, 1982, the ITC voted 4-1 against recommending a section 22 limitation on casein imports. This conclusion ignores the statistical evidence presented to them at the November hearing concerning the adverse impact of casein imports on our dairy price support program.

The June 1981 USDA publication, "U.S. Casein and Lactalbumin Imports: An Economic and Policy Perspective" reported that 102.1 million pounds (67 percent) of all of the casein imported into the United States in 1980 was used in food and animal feeds. The USDA report further noted that a minimum of 52.8 percent of the casein used in food and animal feeds in the United States could be replaced by nonfat dry milk. As such, it is possible to conclude that a minimum of 53.8 million pounds of casein directly displaced nonfat dry milk in 1980.

That translates into better than 175 million pounds of nonfat dry milk—28 percent of all of the milk purchased by the CCC in 1980. In short, had casein not been imported into the United States in 1980 for use in food and animal feeds where nonfat dry milk was a viable substitute, the CCC would have saved a minimum of $158 million in outlays.

Clearly, the domestic dairy price support program has been made more expensive by casein imports. As such, it is absolutely incomprehensible why the ITC refuses to recommend a section 22 limitation on casein imports.

In October, I introduced an amendment to the farm bill that stated the sense of Congress that section 22 limitations should be placed on casein imports so that no more than the average annual imports over the past 5 years is imported into the United States in future years. This amendment was ultimately included in the farm bill and submitted to the ITC as a recommendation from the Congress.

Since the ITC has chosen to ignore our recommendation, I am today introducing legislation that would prohibit annual casein imports from exceeding the average annual casein imports over the past 5 years.

Mr. Speaker, the time has come to finally acknowledge that casein imports interfere with the efficient operation of the dairy price support program. I urge my colleagues to join me in seeking a limitation on casein imports.●

RESULTS OF STUDY REVEAL VAST DISPARITY IN VALUES

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Speaker, last May (1981), I submitted for the RECORD the results of a study by the Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Co. which, among other things, showed the vast disparity in values between the media and the general public with regard to a host of social issues. At this time, I would like to submit another article which corroborates the Connecticut Life study and which appeared in the January 3, 1982, edition of the Washington Post. Entitled "The Media Elite: White, Male, Secular and Liberal," the article is a summary of an in-depth study in Public Opinion magazine by Prof. Robert Lichter, assistant professor of political science at George Washington University, and Prof. Stanley Rothman, professor of government at Smith College.

THE MEDIA ELITE: WHITE, MALE, SECULAR AND LIBERAL

(By S. Robert Lichter and Stanley Rothman)

Newsmen have long cherished the vantage point of the outsiders who keep the insiders straight. But now leading journalists are courted by politicians, studied by scholars and known to millions through their bylines and televised images. In short, the needs of a society increasingly hungry for information have contributed to the rise of a national news network—the new media elite.

As part of a larger study on elites, we surveyed members of the national media elite during 1979 and 1980. The findings, it should be understood, tell us only about the backgrounds and attitudes of journalists as individuals. They do not tell us about the content of the news they present nor, indeed, whether the content is affected by their personal views at all. Nonetheless, they do provide more detail than previously available about who makes up the media elite.

In some respects, the journalists we interviewed appear typical of leadership groups throughout society. The media elite is composed mainly of white males in their thirties and forties. Only one in 20 is nonwhite; one in five is female. Ninety-three percent have college degrees, and a majority (55 percent) attended graduate school as well.

These figures reveal them as one of the best educated groups in America. They are also one of the better paid groups, despite journalism's reputation as a low-paying profession. In 1978, 78 percent earned at least $30,000, and one in three had salaries that exceeded $50,000. Moreover, nearly half (46 percent) reported family incomes above $50,000.

Geographically, they are drawn primarily from Northern industrial states, especially from the Northeast corridor. Two-fifths come from three states: New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. Another 10 percent hail from New England, and almost one in five was raised in the big industrial states just to the west—Illinois, Indiana, Michigan and Ohio. Thus, over two-thirds of the media elite come from thee three clusters of states. By contrast, only 3 percent are drawn from the entire Pacific Coast, including California, the nation's most populous state.

Journalism is a profession associated with rapid upward mobility, yet we found few Horatio Alger stories in the newsroom. On the contrary, many among the media elite enjoyed socially privileged upbringings. Most were raised in upper-middle-class homes. Almost half their fathers were college graduates, and one in four held a graduate degree. Two in five are the children of professionals—doctors, lawyers, teachers and so on. In fact, one in 12 is following in his father's footsteps as a second-generation journalist. Another 40 percent describe their fathers as businessmen.

That leaves only one in five whose father was employed in a low-status blue- or white-collar job. Given these upper-status positions, it is not surprising that their families were relatively well off. Forty-five pecent rate their family's income while they were growing up as above average, compared to 26 percent who view their early economic status as below average.

All these characteristics might be expected to predispose people toward the social liberalism of the cosmopolitan outsider. And indeed, much of the media elite upholds the cosmopolitan or anti-bourgeois social perspective.

A predominant characteristic of the media elite is its secular outlook. Exactly 50 percent eschew any religious affiliation. Another 14 percent are Jewish, and almost one in four (23 pecent) was raised in a Jewish household. Only one in five identifies himself as Protestant, and one in eight as Catholic. Very few are regular churchgoers. Only 8 percent go to church or synagogue weekly, and 86 percent seldom or never attend religious services.

Ideologically, a majority of leading journalists describe themselves as liberals. Fifty-four percent place themselves to the left of center, compared to only 19 percent who choose the right side of the spectrum.

These subjective ratings are borne out by their voting records in presidential elections since 1964. In 1972, when 62 percent of the electorate chose Nixon, 81 percent of the media elite voted for McGovern. This does not appear to reflect any particular personal aversion to Nixon, despite the well-publicized tensions between the press and his administration. Four years later, leading journalists preferred Carter over Ford by exactly the same margin. In fact, in the Democratic landslide of 1964, media leaders picked Johnson over Goldwater by the staggering margin of 16-to-1, or 94 to 6 percent.

These presidential choices are consistent with the media elite's liberal views on a wide range of social and political issues. They show a strong preference for welfare capitalism, pressing for assistance to the poor in the form of income redistribution and guaranteed employment. Few are outright socialists. For example, they overwhelmingly reject the proposition that major corporations should be state owned. Only one in eight would agree to state ownership of corporations, and two-thirds declare themselves strongly opposed.

Most also believe that the free enterprise gives workers a fair shake, and that deregulation of business would be good for the country. Seventy percent agree that private enterprise is fair to working people, and almost as many, 63 percent, say that less regulation of business would serve the national interest.

But they are equally committed to the welfare state. Sixty-eight percent, about the same proportion that praise the fairness of private enterprise, also agree that the government should substantially reduce the income gap between the rich and the poor. They are almost evenly divided over the issue of guaranteed employment. Forty-eight percent believe the government should guarantee a job to anyone who wants one, while a slight majority of 52 percent oppose this principle of entitlement.

It is today's divisive "social issues" that bring their liberalism to the fore. Leading journalists emerge from our survey as strong supporters of environmental protection, affirmative action, women's rights, homosexual rights and sexual freedom in general.

Fewer than one in five assents to the statement, "our environmental problems are not as serious as people have been led to believe." Only 1 percent strongly agree that environmental problems are overrated, while a majority of 54 percent strongly disagree. They are nearly as vehement in their support for affirmative action. Despite both the heated controversy over this issue and their own predominantly white racial composition, four out of five media leaders endorse the use of strong affirmative action measures to ensure black representation in the workplace.

In their attitudes toward sex and sex roles, members of the media elite are virtually unanimous in opposing the constraints of both government and tradition. Large majorities oppose government regulation of sexual activities, uphold a pro-choice position on abortion, and reject the notion that homosexuality is wrong. In fact, a majority would not characterize even adultery as wrong.

When asked whether the government should regulate sexual practices, only 4 percent agree, and 84 percent strongly oppose state control over sexual activities. Ninety percent agree that a woman has the right to decide for herself whether to have an abortion; 79 percent agree strongly with this pro-choice position. Three quarters disagree that homosexuality is wrong, and an even larger proportion, 85 percent, uphold the right of homosexuals to teach in public schools. (A mere 9 percent feel strongly that homosexuality is wrong.)

Finally, 54 percent do not regard adultery as wrong, and only 15 percent strongly agree that extramarital affairs are immoral. Thus, members of the media elite emerge as strong supporters of sexual freedom or permissiveness, and as natural opponents of groups like the Moral Majority, who seek to enlist the state in restricting sexual freedom.

In addition, we inquired about international affairs, focusing on Third World critics' arguments concerning such issues as U.S. arms sales, CIA activity and alleged American exploitation of developing countries.

In most instances, majorities of the media elite voice the same criticisms raised in the Third World. Fifty-six percent agree that American economic exploitation has contributed to Third World poverty. About the same proportion, 57 percent, finds America's heavy use of natural resources to be "immoral." By a 3-to-1 margin, leading journalists reject the counterargument that Third World nations would be even worse off without the assistance they've received from Western nations. Indeed, precisely half agree with the claim that the main goal of our foreign policy has been to protect American business interests.

A majority of 55 percent would prohibit the CIA from ever undermining hostile governments to protect U.S. interests. The question of arms shipments produces an even split of opinion. Forty-eight percent would ban foreign arms sales altogether or restrict them to democratic countries. Forty-seven percent would supply arms to any "friendly" country, regardless of the regime. Only 4 percent would be willing to sell arms to all comers.

These results do not address some of the most basic underlying issue of political life: What groups exert the most influence over social goals and political processes? How much influence should be wielded by such forces?

Specifically, we asked the journalists to rate seven leadership groups in terms of the influence each wields over American life. Then we asked them to rate the same groups according to the influence they should have. The seven groups rated include black leaders, feminists, consumer groups, intellectuals, labor unions, business leaders and the news media.

The journalists see four of the groups as relatively disadvantaged in the competition for social power. Femisists are least powerful, followed closely by black leaders, intellectuals and consumer groups. The unions ranked third, leaving the media close on the heels of business leaders, who are perceived as the most powerful social group in America. Thus, the media elite recognizes its own position of power, viewing itself as more influential then any other leadership group except the business community.

When asked their preferences, this picture changes drastically. They would strip both business and labor of their current perceived power, while raising the status of all the other groups. In the media elite's preferred social hierarchy, business leaders fall from first to fifth position, and unions drop to the very bottom of the ladder. Feminists move up only slightly, but blacks, intellectuals and consumer groups would all have more influence than either business or labor. Emerging at the top of the heap, as the group most favored to direct American society, are the media.●

HARRY KING OF WINTER HAVEN, FLA.

HON. ANDY IRELAND

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, on December 23, my district lost one of its most distinguished and beloved citizens, Harry King of Winter Haven.

Harry King was a respected attorney, a former State senator, and a pillar of his community and his church. He was highly regarded by his colleagues, his clients, and his fellow citizens, who saw in him both a competent and compassionate public servant.

Mr. King began his law practice in Winter Haven in 1925, and still had an active practice when he died in December at 79. He served as Winter Haven city judge in the late 1930's. He was elected to the State senate in 1940 where he served with great distinction until 1956.

Harry King was a powerful and effective State senator during his years at the State's capital. He skillfully represented his district, and Florida's important citrus and phosphate industries. But he was also a man who cared very deeply about the law, and about representing ordinary individuals before the courts. His colleagues paid him the honor of calling him both a lawyer's lawyer, and a people's lawyer.

Mr. King's passing is a terrible loss not only to his wife, Billie, and to his family, to whom he was devoted, but to Winter Haven and all of Florida. He was an outstanding man and we will miss him. I commend his memory to this House.●

WASHINGTON NATIONAL AIRPORT

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, Washington National Airport has a proven record of safety—a record that had not been blemished with a single commercial airline fatality for over 32 years. We are still aware of the tragic accident which occurred here a few weeks ago. This was a devastating event for the families and friends of those lost, and all our sympathy and prayers go out to these people.

In the wake of this alarming crash, it is human nature to place the blame before trial and condemn Washington National as being unsafe and outmoded. Many have already called for its immediate closure—making judgments without the complete story, and indeed, without firm conclusions on the tragedy a few weeks back.

I think we should put this event in reasonable perspective. Such a perspective was eloquently voiced in the lead editorial of the Arizona Republic on January 16, which I have included—

[From the Arizona Republic, Jan. 16, 1982]

AN AMAZING RECORD

Logic suggests that Washington National Airport should not be one of the world's safest major airports.

It was designed and built for an era of smaller, slower, lighter airliners of the 1940s, on a site that defies lengthening of the main 6,900-foot runway that accommodates a new generation of larger, faster and heavier jetliners.

Yet, statistically, the airport indeed is one of the world's safest.

Since President Franklin Delano Roosevelt ordered it built in 1940, there had been only one fatal commercial airline accident at the airport in four decades of operations until this week.

And that occurred 32 years ago in 1949, when a U.S.-made World War II fighter plane collided with an airliner on approach for landing, killing 55 persons.

Since then, tens of millions of passengers and hundreds of thousands of flights have come and gone without mishap.

Critics have been trying for years to close down National, contending that the field is unsafe—despite statistics that show otherwise.

Now, critics who could not accomplish what they hoped in the past will use this week's Air Florida accident as a new argument.

Which is meaningless.

For, the accident this week was a freak that probably can never be duplicated.

Indications are that a series of tragic and rare weather circumstances and pilot decisions came together in a micro-moment to create an irreversible fate for one aircraft and those aboard.

Worse accidents have occurred near airports larger than Washington National, also because of irreversible human or technical failures that are aberrations in flying's steadily improved safety record.

An engine broke away form a DC-10 after takeoff at Chicago in 1979. The widebody jet crashed, killing 275.

Another 113 died in 1975 when a Boeing 727 on approach to Kennedy International Airport fell from the sky after encountering a meteorological phenomenon that affected no other aircraft.

Improperly interpreted radio communications caused the collision of two Boeing 747 jumbo jetliners in the Canary Islands on a runway, taking 581 lives.

In those cases, and dozens of others near airports, neither the size of the airfields nor their locations had any bearing on the loss of life or the cause of the accidents.

Lessons will be learned from the Washington tragedy, and they ultimately could lead to new operating precautions.

To close Washington National because of this accident would be akin to closing down an interstate freeway because of loss of life.●

RESEARCH, THE ECONOMY, AND NATIONAL DEFENSE

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, one of the weaknesses in the way policy is made and implemented in the United States is the unnecessary and unwise fragmentation and separation of issues. This has been true of the Congress, as well as the Executive, and true of Democratic, as well as Republican leadership.

It is regularly said that we cannot have a strong national defense if we have a weak economy, just as the reverse is said. Less often heard is the correlation between both a strong national defense and national economy and the state of U.S. science and technology. The Defense Department, which is dependent upon sophisticated technologies and a highly skilled technical work force, knows that there is a relationship. And our major corporations know that they are dependent upon Government-sponsored research and development, as well as Government subsidized schools, for many of the ideas and people they need. It seems that only the highest officials of the Reagan administration are unaware of this interrelationship.

Our chief economic competitors, of course, understand what it takes to beat U.S. industries in the marketplace. The Soviet Union also knows what it will take to match or surpass our military technologies. All of these nations are supporting increased Government research and development, increased scientific and technical education at all levels, and a strong governmental role. Only the United States is moving in the opposite direction.

Mr. Speaker, I think every Member who is concerned about the U.S. role in the world, whether militarily or commercially, should consider the role of the U.S. Government in supporting research, development, and education. The budgets which we will examine in the weeks to come nearly all have some components of each of these functions. Before we get carried away with rhetoric on the New Federalism, we need to remember the realities of the international situation in which we live.

The following two editorials from the Christian Science Monitor describe the reality of the world today far better than I can. I commend them to my colleagues:

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Tues., Jan. 5, 1982]

THE RESEARCH GAP

Of all the money spent by private industry or the US government, perhaps none is more vital to the long-range prosperity of the United States than "R&D" dollars—investments in basic research and development. After years of neglect, American industry is now plowing more money into invention and product development than ever, an upswing that began in the late 1970s. At the same time, government funds for research in a broad range of scientific areas other than defense are being reduced. Perhaps most disturbing, there is as yet no firm strategy regarding basic research in the US.

Clearly, whether the US maintains its world economic leadership will in great measure be determined by the extent to which it stays abreast of the profound technological changes now transforming the industrial world. But to do this will require that business firms, major universities, national foundations, scientific laboratories, and the federal government itself set aside sufficient funds for new research. And this in turn is dependent on the degree to which the US develops an engineering and scientific community equal to the momentous challenges that will be faced in exploring the space-age technology of the future.

Unfortunately, it is not yet certain that the US will meet the R&D challenge as well as it should, though there are some promising indications of addressing it. Over the course of the decade, spending on research and development is expected to total something on the order of $700 billion to $1 trillion, no paltry sum. Industry now accounts for close to half the total annual R&D budget, compared to one third back in the 1960s when government was the major contributor.

But a significant share of the industry budget will flow into defense-related research. Surely there must be no scrimping on appropriate research for defense. But military spending must not be allowed to become such an enormous drag on the civilian sector of the economy as to divert professional workers and scarce resources away from promising scientific inquiry in nondefense fields.

Many of the federal cutbacks are dismaying. That is especially the case for "basic research" as well as projects related to small businesses, which tend to generate most new jobs within the American workforce. Thus funds for nonnuclear energy programs, including solar power, space research, and conservation research, are being slashed. At the same time federally supported research in the social area is being even more pointedly reduced.

It is also cause for concern that the government is cutting back on its support for engineering and scientific education research projects. There is now, for example, a scarcity of engineers receiving doctoral degrees, and many college-level teaching positions are unfilled. By contrast, Japan, America's major competitor in the electronics, high-technology area, is devoting special attention to boosting its professional workforce of engineers. Moreover, the US has not kept up with the modernization of equipment and facilities in its engineering and research laboratories.

Most serious of all, however, is the fact that there is currently no effort underway in the US for coordinated planning involving R&D expenditures. That is not to say that all such funds should fit neatly into some sort of federal "master plan." Such a centralized approach would garner little public support during a period of federal deregulation.

But at a time when budgets are lean, a modicum of government, industry, and university planning in the research area—if only by reaching a broad consensus that certain forms of research need more focused support than others—seems logical. Such an approach is taken to an extent by the Japanese. One need only think back to the 1950s and 1960s when America established its highly successful space program to realize that, when all parties to a scientific inquiry put their skills to a task, remarkable results can occur.

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Dec. 18, 1981]

JAPAN: COMPUTERS NEXT?

There is no longer any doubt. The race is now on to see which nation—the United States or Japan—controls the space-age technology of the future, the computer and information processing fields. The stakes are enormous, since many experts believe that the total electronics-based society now coming into play will be the "second industrial revolution," adding up to sweeping changes in national defense, manufacturing, and living styles.

At present the US is far out front in computers, given its commanding leadership in software, the electronic instruction that tells computers what to do. But it is clear that Japan—through a maze of formal and unofficial working arrangements among its government leadership, industry, and banking—is determined to accomplish in the area of computers and information processing what it has already done in consumer electronics and automobiles. That is, to wrest outright world market dominance in the 1980s.

Japan will have enormous technical and social hurdles to overcome to win this competition—"battle" may be a more precise term in light of the almost singular concentration on strategy and targeting involved. With an aging work force and rising consumer and union demands. Japanese officials will be hard pressed to hold down costs while expanding output. But the ability of Japan to galvanize its literate and hard-working population to meet such a challenge should not be taken lightly by US firms or the American public. To do so would be to ignore what happened throughout the 1960s and 1970s, when Japanese consumer electronics industries one by one challenged and shot ahead of their US counterparts. That also finally occurred in autos in 1980 when Japan became the world's leading manufacturer, toppling the Detroit-based US industry that had been king of the carmaker hill for more than 70 years.

Although MITI, the Japanese Ministry of International Trade and Industry, has lost some of the vast power it had in the 1950s and 1960s (largely because it lost its right to license companies to deal in foreign exchange), it still has tremendous influence in the economic life of the nation. MITI is currently propelling the drive to shift Japan from dependence on costly resource-based manufacturing industries such as steel, shipbuilding, chemicals, and aluminum to dominance in the high-technology area. It is doing this through a combination of generous no-interest loan programs to industry, research on a fifth-generation computer that can "think" and follow oral commands, and computer software development. Ample amounts of research and investment funds are also available within the private sector thanks to Japan's high savings rate.

The reasons for this profound change in national strategy are clear. As noted by Business Week in a recent special report on Japan, Japanese political and economic leaders have concluded that the resource-poor island nation must shift away from industries where oil and production costs are high into the one area that can capitalize on the nation's skilled work force. That is high technology.

The key to Japan's potential success is precisely its sizable lead in semiconducters and consumer electronics, including personal computers. From such a base, assuming that Japan can achieve at least equality with the U.S. in computer software, it may well be able to underbid U.S. computer firms like IBM in the world market. Not possible? Remember, it did just that with General Motors.

There is, of course, nothing intrinsically undesirable about strong Japanese leadership in computers, nor in good-natured competition between Japan and the U.S. Such competition should keep both national industries on their toes, and spur new technology. Moreover, the two nations are close trading partners and firm allies. Americans have amply demonstrated their high regard for the quality and price of Japanese products through their eager purchases at the sales counter.

On the other hand, there is another aspect to the computer competition that must not be overlooked by the American political and industrial leadership. If Japan (or any other nation, for that matter) were eventually to win the computer contest, this would present enormous implications for the U.S. defense field. Computers play a vital role in advanced weaponry, and the U.S. cannot afford to fall behind in so strategically crucial an area.

Will the U.S. lose the computer war, as it lost the consumer electronics and car wars? Not necessarily. The U.S. is still far out front in basic technology and innovativeness. But the outcome of the contest will also depend on the degree to which the U.S. political, business, and union leadership are willing to work more closely together to achieve common ends. More financial resources will have to be made available for research and development. U.S. firms will have to be more willing to slash prices abroad to hold markets. Perhaps most important, management and stockholders will have to take a longer view than just that of short-term profits. Japanese computer-related firms are now planning in time frames of a decade or more—just as Japanese car firms did with their products.

Will American companies heed the lesson?●

THE COURAGE OF POLAND

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, the Chicago Catholic, the official newspaper of the Catholic Archdiocese of Chicago, Ill., editorialized on the situation in Poland and the stamina of the Polish people in its January 1 edition. I believe that the editor of the Chicago Catholic, Mr. A. E. P. Wall, deserves special commendation for his commentary on the strength of the Polish people and their determination to preserve their church and religious freedoms.

The editorial follows for the Members' attention:

THE COURAGE OF POLAND

The early Marxists knew what they were doing when they tried to eliminate religious beliefs and practice. The United States offered them an example of a nation founded upon firm religious convictions, accompanied by a belief in the sanctity of the individual person. No Marxist state can admit such concepts.

That helps to explain the Soviet Union's efforts to strengthen its grip on Poland.

It also helps to explain the almost incredible courage of the Polish people.

They had every apparent reason to give up, but they did not give up. They were, and are, faced by the most powerful military machine ever known on the European continent.

That military machine, unlike the military apparatus of the United States and other authentic democracies, is an actual part of the government. It does not respond to civil authority, but constitutes an essential part of all authority in the Soviet Union and helps to form all government decisions.

The strength of the Polish people, which produces admiration throughout the world, is drawn from a commitment to God. This baffles the Soviet leadership, which would never trade a tank for a plowshare.

It is possible to use religion as a cloak for oppression and greed. History writhes in embarrassment with stories of wars, assassinations and lesser manipulations in the name of faith.

In part that is because religion is central to life, even when men and women live it in painful contrast to the way Jesus lived it.

Governments wage war in the name of "freedom," as in the invasion of Poland of 1939 or Afghanistan in 1980. It does not follow that the concept of government itself must be discarded or that freedom is always a sham. Neither does it follow that because some have exercised power unjustly in the name of religion, as in Iran or Northern Ireland, religious idealism is tarnished.

Selfish, greedy, angry, vicious individuals may express their character as educators, politicians, generals, preachers, journalists or muggers. God addresses us all. The opportunity for holiness is open to all, even though it is grasped by fewer than all.

It is the possibility of holiness, it is God's outreach to a timid humanity that is often too cautious about reliance upon God, that helps to explain the determination of the Polish people today.●

A TRIBUTE TO JOSEPH YENCHA

HON. DON BAILEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, seldom is adequate praise given to elected officials in this country, especially those who work at the local level. For that reason, I am especially proud and privileged to pay tribute to Joseph Yencha, who, for 25 years, has been a supervisor in Unity Township, Westmoreland County, Pa. In fact, Joe is the first supervisor in that township who has ever retired of his own volition. In a sense, Mr. Speaker, Joe's personal history is similar to and reads like the history of his community. As a young man he was no stranger to the unpaved roads, flood damage, et cetera, that often occurred in the area. But in his years as supervisor, he played a dominant role in organizing and managing one of the most widespread and efficiently maintained road systems in the county. And believe me, Mr. Speaker, this was no simple achievement—especially in light of the extremely difficult and variable weather conditions in western Pennsylvania.

Joe Yencha has served Unity Township with diligence, perseverance, hard work, and, above all, with honor. He is respected by all and known to many as Uncle Joe. Although now retired, his contribution and, indeed, his legacy will not be forgotten. He represents the cheerful commitment to hard work that is increasingly rare in today's world. I salute Joe Yencha—I am proud to be considered a friend, and I will try to follow the path that he has set in our county.●

PRESIDENT REAGAN'S APPOINTMENT OF NEW COMMISSION TO STUDY SOCIAL SECURITY QUESTIONED

HON. ELLIOTT H. LEVITAS

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to an editorial which appeared in the Sheboygan Press of Sheboygan, Wis., on January 6, 1982. The editorial questions President Reagan's appointment of still another commission to study the question of social security reform. The article expresses some of my own concerns.

On March 12, 1981, the President was delivered the final report of the National Commission on Social Security. The National Commission was an independent, bipartisan, prestigious Commission established by a statute passed by Congress in 1977. Approximately $2.5 million was appropriated for extensive research, field hearings, public opinion surveys, investigations, and preparation of the report, after a 2-year study.

While I do not agree with all of the recommendations of the National Commission report, it seems to me that its research and field hearings work and its factual findings provide an excellent basis for considering the future of social security. I am advised that the comprehensive report of the National Commission was totally ignored after its delivery to the White House. Now we are about to go through this whole process again at considerable additional costs to the taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker, we all know how those who favor inaction can try to study an issue into oblivion, hoping to avoid decisions until the problem goes away. The problems of the social security system are not going to go away. This editorial expresses one view that the time for action is now.

I will support any meaningful reforms in social security, regardless of the source, and I wish the new Commission every success in grappling with the difficult problem it faces. But I have questions about what this new panel will do that has not been done before:

[From the Sheboygan Press, Jan. 6, 1982]

WHY, MR. PRESIDENT?

It was less than 10 months ago that the National Commission of Social Security issued a provocative 414-page report—the result of an intensive two-year study—calling for specific measures to rescue the ailing Social Security system.

At that time, we urged President Reagan and the Congress to give the report the consideration it deserved to maintain one of the nation's best programs of social insurance and, at the same time, to shore up eroding public confidence in the system.

Today, it appears that the report—a monumental effort by an independent, bi-partisan, prestigious commission established by a statute passed by Congress—has been totally ignored, and that the study group's two years of labor has been a complete waste of not only time and effort but $2.5 million of the taxpayers money.

The Reagan administration is now proposing creation of a brand new Social Security Reform Panel with the same old assignment: another study to improve and reform the Social Security system.

The public is entitled to know what Mr. Reagan thinks a new study group will do that has not been done before. It is entitled to know why the recent report of the National Commission has been ignored. It is entitled to know why he proposes to go through the whole process again at considerable additional cost to the taxpayer.

Frankly, we would look upon any new study by a group appointed by President Reagan with genuine alarm and suspicion.

Just a few years ago, it was Mr. Reagan who teamed up with Barry Goldwater in a scheme to make Social Security "voluntary"—a scheme that all experts agreed would have undermined the actuarial and financial stability of the system. During the 1980 presidential campaign it was Mr. Reagan who assured us that the integrity of the Social Security system would be preserved, but once safely in office he cynically broke his promise and took steps to weaken the system under the guise of budget cutting. He retreated only when the polls showed that the American people were outraged over what they viewed as an attempt to cripple—if not to dismantle—the whole Social Security program.

The nine-member National Commission on Social Security—the group on which James J. Dillman, a Sheboygan attorney, served as vice chairman—offered specific recommendations last March to solve Social Security's short-range financial problems.

While not everyone will agree with all of the Commission's recommendations, its research and field hearings work and its factual findings should provide an excellent basis for charting the future of Social Security. There can be absolutely no justification for Mr. Reagan's suggestion to go back to square one with another study of the very same sort.

Over the years, eight presidents and 22 Congresses have made solemn promises to the American people that their government, acting as trustees for those who have built up rights under Social Security, will meet its obligations as they fall due.

Now is not the time for President Reagan to be proposing yet another Social Security study—an insensitive maneuver which will only further delay urgently needed reforms in the system. It is time for the president to offer the reassurance that his administration intends to fully carry out its compact with Social Security's contributing workers and beneficiaries.●

HEROIC CONDUCT

HON. MAJORIE S. HOLT

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Speaker, this severe winter has caused much grief and suffering across our land, but it has also included outstanding examples of heroic conduct by brave men helping others.

We were inspired by several such examples when the Air Florida plane crashed into the Potomac River January 13, and just 2 days ago there was a courageous rescue of two boys who had fallen through the ice of the Severn River not far from my home.

Troy Ripley, 17, of Arden on the Severn, pushed a flat-bottomed aluminum rowboat across the ice to reach the younger boys who were in the water.

Ripley also broke through the ice as he pushed the boat, but managed to climb onto the craft and threw a rope to one boy and then the other. He pulled both of them into the boat.

Anne Arundel County rescue personnel could not reach them because of the treacherous ice, but they radioed for a State Police helicopter, which lifted the three youths from the boat.

Mr. Speaker, we can all be thankful that our great country has young men such as Troy Ripley, who acted with courage and imagination to save the lives of two boys.●

INTRODUCTION OF THE COMMUNITY PARTNERSHIP FOR EMPLOYMENT AND TRAINING ACT

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing the Community Partnership for Employment and Training Act. This measure, which will replace the expiring Comprehensive Employment and Training Act, will provide job training, job-finding assistance, and other services to economically disadvantaged persons as well as displaced, experienced workers.

Let me say at the outset that this bill in not intended as a panacea for the tragic and needless waste of 10 million unemployed Americans. Job-finding assistance alone cannot help the unemployed workers obtain jobs which do not exist; skill training alone cannot produce jobs for the highly skilled workers who are now unemployed. Without economic policies in place to generate economic growth, manpower programs are just band-aid solutions.

Nor do I suggest by introducing a bill which authorizes $5 billion in funding for employment and training that this amount is adequate. It is less than half the amount expended in 1979 when unemployment was 5.8 percent.

Training and employment assistance is, however, an essential component of the employment policies of almost every industrialized nation. It represents an investment in our human capital which is as critical for economic security as investment in plant and equipment. It is an investment which directly pays off in increased productivity.

The essential purpose of the bill I am introducing today is to improve the match between the skills of the labor force and the needs of the economy. The National Commission for Employment Policy in its October 1981 report identified the critical Federal interest in supporting employment and training: First, to promote the economic growth by increasing the productive capacity and flexibility of the work force; second, to facilitate adjustment to labor market shocks such as changes in location of military bases, changes in immigration policy, or external forces such as an oil embargo; and, third, to secure equal opportunity for all individuals to compete for good jobs.

Even in the best of times there are hundreds of thousands of youths and adults who lack the skills to compete in the labor market. For these individuals, programs to improve work habits and develop basic educational competencies as well as job-related skills may be the only way to find permanent employment to support themselves and their families. Changes in the economy have all but eliminated unskilled jobs. More and more sophisticated skills are required even for entry-level employment. Without minimal skills, a substantial portion of our economically disadvantaged youth and adults face a lifetime of only intermittent, low-paying jobs and dependence on public assistance.

With rapidly changing technology and the effects of international economic competition, skilled workers are increasingly finding their skills no longer in demand, their occupations and even their industries in decline. At the same time, critical skill shortages exist in new and developing industries and occupations. In health care, the shortage of skilled workers represents a massive and pervasive problem. Some 60,000 licensed practical nurses will be needed each year through 1990 according to reports of the U.S. Department of Labor. As many as 50 new electronic companies are formed each month, according to the American Electronics Association, with an estimated need of 113,098 professionals and 140,000 professionals nationwide by 1984. The shortage of skilled workers in the machine tool industry is well documented, with the Department of Labor estimating that 22,000 new machinists and nearly 9,000 tool and die makers will be needed in the United States through 1985. Yet the number of new journeymen for both trades combined totals only 5,000 per year. The shortage of skilled workers threatens to impede the buildup in the Nation's defense.

The measure I am introducing builds on the experience and expertise developed over the past decade, but incorporates several new policy directions to strengthen the stability of the system and improve its effectiveness.

First, the proposal retains local governments of 100,000 or more population as the principal system for delivering employment or training services. Local elected officials are ultimately accountable to the voters for the use of these Federal funds. No other private or quasi-public institution would have this accountability to the citizens who are recipients of services. Over the past decade, local manpower institutions have developed into a highly professional system. To scrap this system now in favor of an untried, new institutional mechanism would result in certain delay, waste, and possibly failure.

Second, the proposal brings in the private sector as a full partner in deciding how Federal job training funds are to be spent. Private employers are best equipped to determine what skills are needed and whether the training provided adequately meets the skill requirements of employers. Moreover, the private employer has the best entree to other employers to assure placement of participants in unsubsidized private employment. Therefore, the proposal designates a business-dominated private industry council as an equal partner with the local government in approving the use of Federal job training funds.

Third, Federal funds under the proposal are tied to measurable performance standards to verify that Federal funds are used effectively and to assure quality training. The Department of Labor would be required to determine minimum performance standards for placement, job retention, and other factors. In order to continue to receive Federal assistance, local communities would have to achieve local performance goals based on the national standards.

Fourth, local communities would be given maximum flexibility to determine the type of training to be provided and the groups to be targeted for service in the eligible population. Consolidation of training funds into a single grant for the economically disadvantaged will reduce paperwork and minimize administrative costs while allowing flexibility to meet local economic needs. Youth aged 16 to 21 would receive half the funds available for local programs for the economically disadvantaged, but the nature of service would be up to the prime sponsor and the PIC. The rich experience of the last 5 years of demonstrations in youth employment programs has yielded a multitude of successful models from which to choose.

Fifth, the proposal authorizes a new program targeted to serve skilled workers displaced from their occupations by plant closures and relocations, by reduced demand due to technological change, by the impact of foreign imports, and other factors beyond the workers' control. The program authorizes a range of employment services including job search assistance and retraining. To rely solely on income support for such workers wastes the considerable skills and abilities which are abundant among these displaced workers. Retraining such workers or providing assistance in relocating or finding new employment opportunities in occupations where their skills can be transferred not only improves productivity but reduces the enormous costs which society must bear, both economic and social, of such involuntary idleness.

Finally, the proposal establishes a new national program targeted on communities experiencing rates of unemployment in excess of the national average. These communities may use assistance to provide employment and training assistance including subsidized employment when unsubsidized opportunities are not available in the area. This program is to be nationally administered by the Department of Labor to provide a rapid response to communities in distress and to assure the establishment of national priorities for activities funded.

Last week President Reagan spoke to the Nation in his television press conference about the urgent need to qualify unemployed workers for the jobs which are available. I sincerely hope that the President will follow through on his commitment by supporting this legislation. I believe it is a national priority, and I intend to do everything I can to see that it receives prompt and favorable consideration in this session of Congress. To do less is to turn our backs on millions of unemployed workers who, through no fault of their own, face a bleak and wasted present and an uncertain future.

A summary of the major provisions of the Community Partnership for Employment and Training Act follows:

COMMUNITY PARTNERSHIP FOR EMPLOYMENT AND TRAINING ACT

SUMMARY OF MAJOR PROVISIONS

Purpose

To increase employment and productivity by improving the match between the skills of the labor force and the needs of the economy, to assist the individuals entering the workforce or displaced from their current employment to find and retain permanent unsubsidized employment, to reduce the dependence on public assistance by improving the employability of economically disadvantaged persons, and to assist communities experiencing high rates of unemployment by providing employment and training services to those communities. It is further the purpose of this Act to establish a community-based employment and training system built on a partnership between State and local governments and the private sector.

Authorization

Provides for a permanent authorization of appropriations with $5 billion authorized for fiscal year 1983 and such sums as may be necessary for each succeeding fiscal year.

$3.0 billion for Title II, Employment and Training services for the economically disadvantaged;

$500 million for displaced workers under Title III; and

$1.5 billion for national programs, including Job Corps and the National Economic Adjustment Program under Title IV of the Act.

TITLE I—COMMUNITY PUBLIC-PRIVATE TRAINING AND EMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE SYSTEM

Service delivery area

Retains current definitions of a prime sponsor with a population of 100,000 or more.

Requires consortia of local governmental units which do not meet population of 100,000 or more to serve a labor market area.

Provides incentives for forming a consortia which serves a labor market area by setting aside 2 percent of authorized appropriation under Title II; allows 2-year planning and a 50 percent carry-in of unexpended funds for use in the succeeding fiscal year.

Planning

Each prime sponsor must establish or provide for the continuance of a Private Industry Council (PIC) which shall be jointly responsible with the prime sponsor for the planning of activities under the Act. The prime sponsor cannot spend funds available under this Act for any activity which does not have the approval of the PIC.

The initial members of the PIC shall be appointed by the prime sponsor and vacancies are to be filled by the prime sponsor with the consent of ⅔ of the remaining Council members. A majority of the members of the PIC must be representatives of business and industry in the area served by the prime sponsor and the remaining members shall be representatives of labor, education, community-based organizations and economic development agencies.

If the prime sponsor and its PIC cannot concur on the submission of a plan for any period or if the plan submitted is not approved by the Secretary, the Secretary may designate the State or other alternative prime sponsor in the State to develop a plan.

Incentives for joint planning with Employment Service, Vocational Education, Welfare and Economic Development Agencies include two-year planning cycle, 20 percent cap on administrative costs and 50 percent carry-in of funds.

Provides for the establishment of a State Employment and Training Coordinating Council.

Performance standards

Authorizes the Secretary of Labor to establish minimum national performance standards based on placement in unsubsidized jobs, retention, earnings gains and reductions in welfare payments for adults and separate standards for youth which include educational competencies, school completion, referrals to other training programs or enlistment in the military.

Permits Secretary to waive any of the standards for a prime sponsor which demonstrates exceptional local economic hardships and approve plan with less stringent goals.

In case of failing to attain performance goals for 2 consecutive years, prime sponsor may lose eligibility and the Secretary may designate alternate prime sponsor.

Allowances

All persons participating in training under the Act shall receive allowances which, when added to unemployment or welfare payments, will be no less than the minimum wage.

TITLE II—EMPLOYMENT AND TRAINING SERVICES FOR THE ECONOMICALLY DISADVANTAGED

Formula

Funds are allocated according to a national formula based on unemployment and low income factors.

Allowable activities

Allowable activities include those authorized under Title II-B, IV-A and C and Title VII of CETA, as well as temporary subsidized public and private non-profit employment.

Prime sponsors would receive a single federal grant for employment and training services for disadvantaged youth and adults with PIC and prime sponsor determining types of training and services to be provided. At least 50 percent must be expended to serve youth aged 16 to 21. However, if ratio of economically disadvantaged youth to economically disadvantaged adults is less than the ratio of such individuals nationally, the prime sponsor may reduce proportionally the amount required to be expended on services to youth.

Allows wage subsidies with private-for-profit employers for economically disadvantaged in-school youth aged 16 to 19 part-time employment during the school year and full time summer employment up to 8 weeks' duration.

Eligibility

Economically disadvantaged individuals aged 16 and older whose family income does not exceed 70 percent of the BLS lower living standard or who are eligible for public assistance may be eligible for services under Title II.

Ten percent of the participants may be exempt from the income eligibility criteria if they have encountered barriers to employment such as handicapped individuals, persons of limited English-speaking ability, displaced homemakers, ex-offenders, alcoholics or addicts.

TITLE III—EMPLOYMENT AND TRAINING ASSISTANCE FOR DISPLACED WORKERS

Funds allocated to States on the basis of size of the labor force and unemployment.

Federal funds must be matched one-for-one with non-federal public and private cash contributions.

Eligible participants include workers whose employment has been terminated or workers who have received notice of termination or suspension as a result of plant closures or permanent reductions in force. Eligible participants also include unemployed workers with limited opportunities for employment or reemployment in the same or similar occupation.

Non-federal match can be met by States providing unemployment insurance benefits to persons in training courses in skill shortage occupations. The match may also include the direct cost of employment or training services provided by State or local programs.

Authorized activities

Authorizes wide range of employment services, including job search assistance, and retraining and relocation assistance.

TITLE IV—NATIONAL EMPLOYMENT AND TRAINING PROGRAMS

Mandates Secretary to reserve 2.7 percent of funds available for Title II for services to Indians and 2.8 percent of the funds for services to Migrants and farmworkers.

Retains Job Corps as a separate national program for economically disadvantaged young men and women aged 16 to 25.

Title IV also authorizes research and demonstration programs, training and technical assistance, labor market information, NOICC and job bank program.

Establishes National Economic Adjustment Program to assist communities experiencing high unemployment by offering a wide range of employment and training services and establishes national priorities which will lead to job growth. The same income eligibility applies for this program as for Title II except that 20 percent of the participants in the program may be individuals who are not economically disadvantaged. Participants must have been unemployed for at least 10 out of the last 12 weeks.

Reconstitutes the National Commission for Employment Policy as an independent non-governmental Commission to advise the President and the Congress on national employment and training issues.

TITLE V—AMENDMENTS TO OTHER STATUTES

Amends Wagner-Peyser Act (which established the U.S. Employment Service) to provide for 2 percent incentive bonus for joint ES planning with prime sponsors. Eliminates non-labor exchange duties from the Employment Service's functions. Also provides for a needs-based formula for distribution of the remaining 98 percent of the funds.

Amends Title IV-C of the Social Security Act (WIN) to (1) provide job search assistance for WIN registrants; (2) require joint planning with the prime sponsors under the Community Partnership for Employment and Training Act; and (3) utilize the Private Industry Council (PIC) instead of the Labor Market Advisory Council, now authorized under WIN.●

LIMITED HARD NEWS AND HEIGHTENED FRUSTRATION ARE PART OF POLISH VIGIL

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, with the fast-breaking developments in Poland, and with the limited amount of hard news coming from that country, our concern is heightened by the frustration of not knowing what is really taking place. Mike Royko, the noted columnist of the Chicago Sun-Times, addresses the Polish crisis in his column of December 22. SWCF I believe that the Members will find it of special interest, I am pleased to insert it at this point in the RECORD.

[From the Chicago Sun-Times, Dec. 22, 1981]

THE JACKBOOTS RETURN

(By Mike Royko)

When I was very young, I briefly wondered if communism was really as bad as my elders made it out to be.

It seemed to have some good points: the goals of eliminating poverty, wiping out extreme class differences, taking the power out of the hands of a rich few and spreading it around, assuring everyone of basic necessities such as work, medical care, a decent place to live.

So it wasn't surprising that so many Americans during the 1930s, '40s, '50s and even up through the '60s saw it as a form of government that could work—if not here, at least in countries that had been exploited by colonialism or a succession of homegrown dictatorships.

But it didn't take me long to change my thinking despite a loathing for red baiters like Sen. Joseph McCarthy, a drunken, depraved political opportunist.

One factor in my changed attitude was being sent to Korea. I wasn't sure if we belonged in Korea, but I knew that the Chinese communists on the other side, who were blazing away at us, didn't belong there either. And I've never been able to generate any comradely feelings for somebody who was trying to kill me.

And since then, communism's basic flaw has become obvious. Time after time we've seen this flaw. It doesn't matter in which country they try it—Russia, China, Czechoslovakia, Albania, Cuba, Hungary, and all the others.

We're seeing it again in Poland.

Eventually it comes down to the same thing: Guns, tanks, secret police, mass arrests, mass internments, mass killings, and a reign of fear and oppression.

That's how they rule. Not with any persuasive economic theory. It's the old law-and order game: I'm the law and you follow my order. Or I'll kill you.

The biggest problem with communism is that it creates a giant bureaucracy. And in any bureaucracy, the most successful participants are those who live by the bureaucracy's rules. The rules can be rigid, stupid, unfair, pointless outdated and mentally numbing.

That doesn't matter to the successful bureaucrat. If it's a rule, he follows it and imposes it on others.

So in communist countries, the most unquestioning, devoted bureaucrats rise to the top and the governments wind up being dominated by those with the narrowest minds and the least imagination.

And if there is anything that somebody with a narrow mind and little imagination hates and fears, it's someone with broad vision and a creative mind.

That's why it's so important for communist bureaucracies to control a society's artists. The bureaucrat can't have novelists and poets and musicians sharing their vision of Man. The bureaucrats want rulebooks and governmental forms and memos and files, which they understand.

That's why the first thing any communist government does is to seize the press. They can't tolerate an informed citizenry. When people get information, they start forming opinions of their own. Ignorance is essential for the ruling bureaucrat—his own and that of those he controls.

That's why travel is so restricted in communist countries. They're afraid that if enough of their people go out and have a taste of freedom, they might develop a healthy appetite for it.

That's why secret police and spies are an essential part of any communist government. The bureaucrat is always worried about what the people might be thinking out there. Someone who has ideas that aren't government-provided and government-approved can be dangerous.

And that's why the Polish bureaucracy's military branch had to finally resort to brute force. People like Lech Walesa had gone too far.

Actually, in the minds of the communist bureaucrats, Walesa had already gone too far the day he made his first demand, the day he was willing to step out of the ranks of workers and say that the government was ruining the country.

But they had done such a disastrous job of running the country that they couldn't very well say he was wrong.

The alarm bells went off for the Polish bureaucrats, though, when Solidarity said it wanted a hand in running the government and asked for open elections.

When talk of open elections begins, the bureaucrats have only one response: Guns, tanks and secret police.

Now, the tried-and-true labels are being applied.

Those who have rebelled against the rule of the bureaucratic minority are "enemies of the state."

The Poles who believe that the Polish people should determine their own destinies are the "hoodlums and criminals."

The Poles who believe that the wielders of guns and clubs and tanks against other Poles are right are the "patriots."

It doesn't matter that the vast majority of Poles want a revolutionary change in their form of government and would make the changes if they had a chance. They are labeled as "counter-revolutionaries," and the minority that puts its boots on their chests calls itself the true revolutionaries.

To the ruling bureaucrat, the people are the enemy of the state, and the state is the bureaucracy. After all, they control the filing cabinets and the government buildings and the tanks and guns and the rulebooks.

When Orwell created "doublespeak" many years ago, he really knew the bureaucratic mind.

It's a strange thing. There has been little, if nothing, said by those prominent, radical-chic Americans who feel so deeply about the injustices of South American dictators, Iranian shahs and other despots.

Aren't they offended by Polish despots killing Polish workmen?

MEMBERS OF CONGRESS SHOULD NOT GET SPECIAL TAX BREAKS

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, as we begin the second session of the 97th Congress, the American people are looking to us for serious and thoughtful leadership in coping with enormous domestic and international problems. There is no way this Congress will be able to enjoy the confidence and trust of the American people unless our citizens are convinced of the integrity of Congress and its determination not to claim special privileges for itself.

It is in this spirit that today I am introducing the "Fair and Equal Taxation of Members of Congress Act of 1982." This legislation will repeal the special tax benefits Congress hastily voted itself in the closing hours of the last session.

Only when Congress acts in an exemplary fashion does it deserve to have the trust and confidence of the American people in coping with the difficult challenges we face. Prompt passage of the Fair and Equal Taxation of Members of Congress Act of 1982 is critical if we are to earn that trust.●

ENDING INDIFFERENCE ON NUCLEAR WAR

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, as this Congress sets about its business in 1982, it is important for us to look at the hopes and fears of all the peoples of the world. One universal fear is that of war. One universal hope is that of peace. Nuclear war is the greatest fear.

There are those in this country, and I am sad to say, in high places in our Government, who believe a nuclear war can be contained. Some even assert a nuclear war can be "won," whatever that means to the few who survive. This type of loose rhetoric, or foolish thought, is what has triggered mass protests in Europe. In this country, the response has been less dramatic, probably because the American people cannot believe such statements are serious.

Those who are strongly reacting to policies and policymakers who think the unthinkable is acceptable are helping the cause of peace. The growing concern about the nuclear arms race in this country is to be applauded. It is also a movement overdue.

Mr. Speaker, I obviously do not know if this nuclear madness can be stopped. But I agree with Elie Wiesel, the noted author, who recently wrote:

Evil is contained in indifference. We might even say that indifference permits evil to take root, spread and bloom. If nuclear war breaks out one day, it will be because of human apathy.

I commend the following commentary by Elie Wiesel to my colleagues:

[From the Los Angeles Times, Jan. 4, 1982]

ARMS FOES SPEAK FOR HUMANITY'S HOPE

(By Elie Wiesel)

We are now witnessing in Western Europe, and even in the United States, an awakening of increasing numbers of men and women who, confronted by the reality if not the imminence of nuclear peril, are becoming aware of their impotence. From Oslo to Frankfurt, from Paris to Amsterdam, angry young people are taking to the streets in an effort to influence public opinion and to force their respective governments to reconsider their strategic options dominated by atomic terror. The magnitude of the protests recalls the 1950s, when the "movement for peace," inspired and guided by Moscow, was a movement against the Bomb—or, more precisely, against the American Bomb.

Today it's not the same. Young people are no longer taking sides. They oppose the nuclear menace regardless of its origin and nationality. The communists most certainly exploit this situation to the advantage of the Soviet Union, but the young protesters in general haven't intended their protest to be interpreted in this way. They want only one thing: to lead an existence without fear, far from the abyss and the apocalypse whose shadow already covers the horizon.

One understands them. Their anxiety is familiar to us; it touches us. They are aware that humanity is running to its ruin, and yet they know that they are incapable of stopping it, which heightens their anger. One expects them to study, to arm themselves with diplomas, to look for work, to establish lobbies. One demands that they believe in a humane future marked by promise rather than by malediction. One tells them to work for future generations, to keep alive their dreams and their hopes, and yet they are not blind. They cannot not see the signs, they cannot not sense the meaning of history: By producing more and more deadly nuclear arms, nations will end up using them. And finally, then, the human adventure will meet its end in the smoke and ashes. And, since they know this, they proclaim it. They shout, they scream. It's only natural; we wouldn't really want them to remain indifferent, after all.

The previous generations were indifferent, and we are suffering the consequences. We know that today with certainty. If the free world had reacted more quickly, with more resolution, Nazi Germany would have collapsed at the first sign of resistance. And history would have spared itself the flames of Auschwitz.

We know that now. Evil is contained in indifference. We might even say that indifference permits evil to take root, spread and bloom. If nuclear war breaks out one day, it will be because of human apathy.

Such apathy once existed, and it is still with us today. We can't bring ourselves to face the idea of such a terrible, irrevocable war. And so we prefer to think about other things, to avert our gaze and look elsewhere. The nuclear arsenal doubles from year to year, and yet we behave as if we were safe.

Paradoxically, in literature, the subject is treated with a quasi-prophetic realism. We publish novels that "describe" World War III. We recount it as if it had already taken place, as if we had already entered the era that follows, as if the nuclear holocaust were already behind us.

This also seems quite ominous: What we imagine today will end up coming true. By evoking the war, it will end up breaking out. Here is the dilemma: The threat is drawing closer, and it can be stopped by neither speeches nor silence.

I confess that this terrifies me. A friend just returned from a conference of Eastern social philosophers, and reports that all his colleagues are convinced that time is running out, and that the West is living its last months, its final years. There are, therefore, thinkers—"wise men"—who already await the catastrophe.

Will we know how to stop it? Just as Albert Camus "imagined Sisyphus happy," it is up to our generation to banish the ghost of war. We need only evoke Auschwitz to protest nuclear proliferation, for the next holocaust will inevitably be nuclear, and hence planetary. That is why we have to fight it.

This is not easy, I admit. Unilateral disarmament reinforces the presence of dictatorships. That leaves only universal disarmament. A beautiful dream? Why not? Would that communist youth follow our example; would that people on both sides proclaim their faith in the future and their love of life; would that they denounce together, and for the same reasons, the nuclear peril; then their hope will become a promise. May the year 1982 lead us to that promise in the name of that hope.●

THE AIR FORCE THUNDERBIRDS

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in memory of four fine young men who have given their lives in the service of their country. They are Maj. Norman Lowry III, Capt. Willie Mays, Capt. Joseph Peterson, and Capt. Mark E. Melancon, of the U.S. Air Force.

These heroic officers were members of the Air Force's fine flying team, the Thunderbirds. They died last Monday, the 18th of January while rehearsing the flying show that they bring to many cities across this country and across the world.

This team, the Thunderbirds, is a demonstration team of the U.S. Air Force and is composed of some of the best pilots in the Air Force. The team was first organized in 1953 and since that time has performed before more than 140 million people in the 50 States, 45 foreign countries, and 4 free world protectorates.

The mission of the Thunderbird team is to plan and present precision aerial maneuvers that demonstrate the capabilities of Air Force jet aircraft and the exacting professional skills that the Service develops in its people to fly and maintain these airplanes.

All the members of the Thunderbird team are volunteers, drawn from normal Air Force resources in a competitive selection process.

Many of us in Congress have seen them perform and I have always been impressed with their skill, dedication, and patriotism.

The families of these men, the Air Force, and our great Nation have indeed suffered a great loss.

It is my fervent hope that the team will survive this sorrow and continue to represent this country and our Air Force in the grand tradition that it has maintained since 1953.●

THE VIEW FROM $204 A WEEK

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, Vicki Williams is a factory worker in Huntington, Ind. She is also a woman who likes to speak her mind, rather than have politicians and editorialists do it for her, and she did just that very eloquently in the January 18 Newsweek feature, "My Turn." She pays annual Federal income taxes of $1,570.92, and she describes herself as one who lives a "hairbreadth from economic disaster." Yet she gives us a lesson in generosity and caring that I believe is truly typical of this Nation. She scorns the Reagan tax cut. She is not fed up with paying taxes to help those less fortunate than she, persons with whom she can identify.

I think there are a lot of Vicki Williamses out there, and we should assess their attitudes and their sentiments as we prepare for yet another battle over budget cuts and the rest of what Mrs. Williams describes as "cruel and self-serving" Reaganomics.

The article follows:

[From Newsweek, Jan. 18, 1982]

THE VIEW FROM $204 A WEEK

(By Vicki Williams)

I consider myself the classic "poor overburdened taxpayer" that you hear so much about these days. I work for an electronics company and make $6.58 an hour which translates into $204 per week after deductions, $30.21 of which are Federal withholding taxes. I have a husband, laid off, whose unemployment compensation has run out, and a 13-year-old son who thinks he should have a leather coat, a P.K. Ripper motocross bike, a Pioneer stereo and an Asteroids game. It bothers me a lot that I can't afford to buy him any of these things. It also bothers me that I'm not sure how we're going to fill up the fuel tank often enough to stay warm this winter.

There is something else that bothers me, though not to the same extent as my son's unfulfilled desires or the ever-hungry fuel tank, and that is that every single politician and editorialist is positive he knows exactly what I think. Everyone seems to be wildly anxious to be my spokesman. Yet these people don't know a damn thing about how the "poor overburdened taxpayer" thinks or lives. I imagine it's been quite some time since most politicians or well-known journalists lived on $204 per week, though I've read plenty of complaints from congressmen about their meager salaries. One even said he had to sleep in his office because he couldn't afford to buy a house. Do you know how much pity I can spare for a senator who can't live on $60,000 a year?

Tired: I know I'm not as articulate as the people who write the editorials for newspapers and the speeches for politicians, but just once I'd like to have on the record the thoughts of an average taxpayer. I'm tired of these people putting their words in my mouth and their thoughts in my head.

One of the statements I read and hear most often is how fed up I'm supposed to be with the amount of my taxes that goes toward welfare, food stamps, programs for the elderly, subsidized school lunches and other supportive social services. Wrong! What the people "up there" don't understand is that I identify with the beneficiaries of these programs much more than I do with the politicians and the media people. "There, but for the grace of God, go I." So far, I have never had to rely on welfare, free lunches or Medicaid, but I very well might someday. When I was divorced, I could have qualified for welfare. Fortunately, I had parents who were in a position to help, but if I hadn't, you can believe I would have swallowed my pride rather than watch my son go hungry. People like me, who live only a hairbreadth from economic disaster, are glad those programs are out there, though we pray we'll never have to use them. We feel sympathy for the ones who do.

In 1977 my sister-in-law was abandoned by her husband. Her health did not permit her to work full time, so she drew $194 per month from the welfare department to support herself and her child. I doubt that anyone can think she lived extravagantly on $194 per month.

I think it's possible that at least one of the very same politicians who are now complaining about welfare recipients might have taken a political junket during one of the months that my sister-in-law and her son lived on $194. Believe me, I resent that junket at my expense much, much more than I resent helping an ADC mother, or buying eyeglasses for an elderly person or free lunches for a ghetto child.

To me, Reaganomics is cruel and self-serving. Reagan seems to be telling us that the United States is a sinking ship and that if we harden our hearts and throw a few people overboard, we can lighten the load. Then possibly, the Ship of State can sail back to shore. I don't see my country quite that way. The philosophy behind the original structure of the United States is that we are a people who sink or swim together. We don't make human sacrifices.

If there is even one child in this country who is hungry or one old person who needs medical care, then I want my $1,570.92 in taxes to go toward helping that child or that old person. I think this country is based on the philosophy that when that $1,570.92 is gone, we will find more to take its place, as long as the need is there.

I know about the cheaters. There are always cheaters. They are a part of life as surely as death and taxes. Certainly, if they are caught, they should be punished and denied aid, but I know we'll always support some cheaters along with the "truly needy." If we have to give a free lunch to one child whose parents could afford to pay in order to give free lunches to nine children who genuinely deserve them, so be it.

Benefits: The much-touted tax cut doesn't make sense to me. Perhaps there's a complicated economic formula that explains the logic of a tax cut at the same time we're slashing Federal programs because of lack of funds, but if so, I missed it. I pay $30.21 per week to the Federal government. As I understand it, when all the tax cuts are in effect, I will only pay $22.66, giving me $7.55 extra to save or spend. Well, I could do a few things with $7.55 a week but, had I been consulted, I would have just as soon paid it and kept the food-stamp program or veterans' benefits intact. I suspect that the government will give it to me with one hand and take it away with the other.

You see, I really believe that most politicians and media people think that those of us out here in America who work in the factories and offices are ignorant. I believe that they think we will never catch on to their sleights of hand. I believe that they think they can tell us the grass is black one day and white the next and we'll never trust ourselves enough to look down and say, "Why, that grass isn't black or white—it's green!" Well, we know the grass is green. We just don't know what to do about it.

We don't really believe that 56 oil companies recorded 98 percent of the increase in all corporate profits from 1978 through 1980 for our benefit. We don't believe the tobacco subsidy is for our benefit. We don't believe that congressmen who were violently anti-AWACS magically changed their minds for our benefit. We know it's always us who pay the bills that result from the politicians' machinations.

I wish a politician would come along who'd tell me that the grass is green.●

DR. CYNTHIA E. PREISS, GENUINE HEROINE

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Speaker, my good friend, Mrs. Diane Jacobs of Beverly Hills, Calif., has recently brought to my attention the true story of a genuine heroine. This story is so remarkable and inspiring that I would like to share it with my colleagues.

The protagonist of this story is Cynthia E. Preiss, a doctor of chiropractic. A little more than 10 years ago, Dr. Preiss received her degree and began to practice. Her outstanding ability quickly catapulted her to the forefront of her profession. Within 3 years of receiving her degree, she was appointed by then-Gov. Ronald Reagan to the California State Board of Chiropractic Examiners.

Dr. Preiss' thorough command of the legislative and political questions facing her profession was soon recognized by the board, and she became the board's secretary, and ultimately, its first woman president. In that capacity, Dr. Preiss was a tireless advocate of the right of chiropracters to practice as qualified physicians. Those who were familiar with her work on the board have been effusive in their praise of her accomplishments.

Over little more than a 5-year period, Dr. Preiss became active in dozens of political and civic organizations, as well as virtually every professional organization concerned with her specialty. Mr. Speaker, her achievements are amazing for anyone to accomplish in a lifetime, let alone 5 or 6 years.

As 1977 began, it seemed clear that Dr. Preiss was destined for a stellar career. As a young woman who had already become an influential voice in her profession, there seemed to be no limit to how far she could go.

But in March of that year, Dr. Preiss was struck from behind by a hit-and-run driver. The force of the impact caused severe and permanent injuries, resulting in paralysis of the spine.

The extent of Dr. Preiss' injuries is such that she is paralyzed from above the waist. She must lie flat most of the time.

One might expect that an individual so seriously and permanently injured would be forced to withdraw from public activities. Those of us who have never suffered such disabilities must wonder how we would cope with so dramatic a change in our lives. How easy it would be to resort to self-pity and despair in the light of such a senseless tragedy.

But, Dr. Preiss is a remarkable person. She has faced the challenges of her disability with a determination to continue her work on behalf of her profession and the ideals in which she believes. Her long list of accomplishments does not end in March 1977.

Since her accident, Dr. Preiss has served as secretary and treasurer of FEDOI Chiropratic Licensing Boards. She has also served as dean of the graduate school and continuing education division of the Los Angeles College of Chiropractic.

Politically, Dr. Preiss has increased her activism. She currently serves as the executive secretary of the Beverly Hills Republican Assembly, and in 1980, she served as national chairman of Doctors of Chiropractic for Reagan-Bush.

Mr. Speaker, this remarkable woman will be honored by her peers in the chiropractic profession this month for her outstanding ability and dedication. Dr. Preiss is an inspirational example to all of us of someone with a positive mental attitude who has successfully learned to deal with the unexpected challenges and misfortunes that assault us in life.

Dr. Preiss' story is a heroic one, indeed. It is altogether appropriate for us in Government to take note of her triumph in this, the National Year of Disabled Persons. Dr. Preiss is an example of a disabled person who is definitely not handicapped. Her story can enrich the lives of us all.●

SOVIET-AMERICAN RELATIONS

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my foreign affairs newsletter for January 1982, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

SOVIET-AMERICAN RELATIONS

Americans have debated how to conduct relations with the Soviet Union since that nation's founding more than 60 years ago. Although they understand that the relationship is the dominant preoccupation of American foreign policy, Americans are nevertheless confused and frustrated by the competition, confrontation, and cooperation which exist simultaneously in the relationship. They long for a balanced and comprehensive assessment of the danger and opportunity facing Americans in the years ahead; but so far, at least, American leaders have seldom been successful in constructing and articulating a balanced strategy capable of attracting sustained bi-partisan support at home and the cooperation of key allies abroad.

Americans often find it difficult to understand the Soviet perspective on the world. The Soviet Union resembles an enigma hidden by veils of secrecy and propaganda. Soviet leaders see a hostile world around them. They seek security through an excessive expansion of military power, the domination of neighbors, and tight control of the life of their people. The Soviet Union is a military superpower determined to be coequal to the United States, but it has an economy which lags far behind ours in the living standards it is able to produce. In spite of some impressive Soviet achievements, the Soviet leaders regard American economic power with a feeling of inferiority. They preside over an economic system which is too centralized and rigid to meet the ordinary needs of its citizens. Soviet leaders stress the value of solving political and economic problems by military power, and in the process they often lose rather than gain influence (as in Afghanistan). Their world view is rooted in the theory of the class struggle and the clash of different social systems—so they see conflict between East and West as inevitable.

Americans have always had great difficulty agreeing how to deal with the Soviet Union. We strongly oppose its attempts to intervene militarily, whether directly, as in Afghanistan, or indirectly, as with the use of surrogate Cuban troops in Angola. We find extremely distasteful the authoritarian nature of the Soviet system. We are uncomfortable with the unfortunate reality that our differences with the Soviet Union cannot be easily resolved through negotiation. Most Americans are persuaded that we must deal with the Soviet Union from a position of military, political, and economic strength. This view is prominent today; there is a sharp sense among many Americans that our power and influence have been declining. We tend to forget the substantial advantages we have over the Soviet Union: the cohesion of our allies, our favored geographical location, our friendly neighbors, and our strong military, economic, and political capabilities. We also tend to forget that the Soviet Union is subject to considerable stress and strain. Its leadership is very old, and the lack of an arrangement for succession is bound to lead to a period of instability at the top. The economy has performed poorly, especially in agriculture, which remains its Achilles' heel. Many Soviets expect their standard of living to decline in the coming years. The differences in birth rates among ethnic groups will pose difficult problems, and the disarray of world Communism will likely become more serious. No Soviet leader can say that troubles like those in Poland will not erupt in other parts of the Soviet empire.

The issues between our two nations are momentous: How do we avoid a clash of nuclear or conventional forces? Can we slow by negotiation the endless cycle of military competition? How do we get the Kremlin to move in the direction of greater restraint in foreign policy? To what extent should trade be used to influence Soviet behavior? Given the differences between the United States and its allies in the willingness to link economic policies to Soviet conduct, can we develop a broadly supported allied economic policy toward the Soviet Union? How should we express our concerns about human rights in the Soviet Union?

The basic question in Soviet-American relations is not whether our interests conflict, but whether the competition and the differences can be managed peaceably and equitably. On the surface, at least, the United States and the Soviet Union have some common interests. The prevention of nuclear war is the major one; others are economic development, East-West trade, the sharing of some forms of technology, cooperation in areas such as the environment, outer space, and medicine, and broader scientific and cultural exchange. Yet the definitions of these interests and the means used to pursue them differ profoundly. It is the central challenge for both governments to manage the differences without going to war. It simply is not realistic to anticipate an all-encompassing relaxation of tensions between the two nations. For the foreseeable future, Americans will have to realize that the search for a way of living together will yield only modest results. We should not expect to become partners and we cannot afford to become active enemies.

The Soviet Union will remain the primary concern of American foreign policy, but we must not become obsessed with the relationship to the detriment of other American interests. We should not view every world problem exclusively in the context of an East-West struggle. The risk of such an approach is that it distracts us from critical regional economic and political problems which, if solved, could blunt Soviet advances.

The United States must, of course, remain strong in every measure of national strength, military as well as economic and political. The Soviet Union is a global power with which we have no choice but to deal. I expect difficult years ahead in the Soviet-American relationship. However, those years will be made easier if there is broad public understanding of the complex nature of that relationship and if there is cohesion among our allies.●

EXAMPLE OF HEROISM

HON. MARJORIE S. HOLT

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Speaker, when the Air Florida airliner crashed into the Potomac River January 13, there were several outstanding examples of heroism.

I want to make special note of the great skill and bravery of Donald Wilfred Usher, of Gambrills, Md., who piloted a helicopter in difficult and dangerous maneuvers near the 14th Street Bridge to pull survivors from the tail section of the wrecked airliner, where they were desperately clinging in freezing water.

At one point, he hovered the helicopter with one skid in the water to pick up a survivor.

Mr. Usher, a pilot for the U.S. Park Police, has described for us the heroism of one man who passed the life ring from the helicopter to five other survivors, delaying his own rescue until the others had been saved.

When the others had been pulled to shore, this man disappeared beneath the icy water before the helicopter could reach him.

Mr. Usher served our country in the past as a helicopter pilot in the Vietnam war, and as a police officer he continues to show outstanding courage and devotion to duty.●

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO SECURE THE RELEASE OF ESSENTIAL INFORMATION FROM THE U.S. PAROLE COMMISSION

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today which seeks to cure a potentially serious public safety problem confronting not only the constituents of my district but the entire Nation. Local law enforcement officials of the Sacramento region have brought to my attention the fact that the U.S. Parole Commission currently refuses to disclose on a regular basis the names of Federal parolees released in local law enforcement jurisdictions. These officials have expressed their concern that this Federal policy may have a detrimental effect on their local law enforcement capabilities.

The Privacy Act is cited by the Commission as the statutory basis for this nondisclosure standard. Numerous legal experts have researched this matter and disagree with the Parole Commission's interpretation of the Privacy Act. In fact, it was their assessment that should the Parole Commission conclude that the release of such information was for a lawful purpose, the Privacy Act would permit such a release. The decision not to release these names appears thereby to be a discretionary act of the Parole Commission and not mandated by Federal law.

The Commission's overly restrictive policy has serious ramifications for all Americans. As of June 30, 1981, there were 13,561 Federal parolees released in local communities under Federal supervision. Many of these individuals are persons who have been convicted of violent crimes and whose presence in a community should be known to local law enforcement officials.

Given that this policy of the Commission is adversely affecting the local law enforcement efforts, I have prepared legislation which directs the U.S. Parole Commission to make available, upon request by the director or chief officer of a State or local law enforcement agency, the names and addresses of Federal parolees currently under Federal supervision within their jurisdiction. To preserve the confidential nature of this information, the legislation prohibits local law enforcement agencies from releasing this data to nonlaw enforcement officials.

I believe that this mutual sharing of law enforcement information between Federal and local agencies should result in more effective supervision of Federal parolees while assuring local law enforcement agents with the necessary access to data essential for their police enforcement activities. It is my hope that this measure will provide an effective vehicle for helping to secure the safety of the American people.

In closing, I would like to applaud the efforts of Sheriff Duane Lowe, Police Chief John Kearns and City Councilman Lloyd Connelly for alerting my community to this disturbing practice by the Parole Commission. This action demonstrates their commitment to maintain the health and safety of citizens who reside in Sacramento County.●

IN MEMORY OF PHILIP HANDLER

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, last month a well-known American and world citizen, Dr. Philip Handler, died. He was known to most of us as the president, for 12 years, of the National Academy of Sciences. He was known to others for his words and deeds.

The following editorial from Chemical and Engineering News captures some of the work of Philip Handler, and indicates why we should be grateful for his years of service to the Nation and to all humanity.

The editorial follows:

PHILIP HANDLER 1971-1981

Philip Handler was an institution in his own right on the Washington—indeed the world—science scene for many years. After long service on the National Science Board, the policy-making group for the National Science Foundation, he was president of the National Academy of Sciences (NAS) and chairman of its operating arm, the National Research Council (NRC), for 12 years before retiring last July. Less than six months later, he has died at 64, a victim of cancer.

There is no doubt that Handler relished his 12 years at the NAS helm. At an academy council dinner in his honor he said, "I have had an absolutely glorious time. Opportunities for service which are at the same time warm loving, rich experiences are very rare. I have been very fortunate and deeply, highly privileged by all of you."

Such a personal expression of feeling seemed to reflect on his overall views on science. In an interview with C&EN, the last he gave to the press as NAS president (C&EN, July 20, 1981, page 38), he said, "Science is a human endeavor. It is about people in the end. It can't be held out there as some strange objective thing that doesn't relate to the world in which people function. It must not. It would be a terrible mistake."

Handler's career at NAS and NRC reflected his conviction that the stature of science, both as an intellectual exercise and as an institution with influence for the public good, depends ultimately on its integrity.

For instance, he came to NRC with a plan in hand to enhance its performance as a science adviser to the government by eliminating bias in council committees and tightening the peer review process for its reports. And although he was not a hip shooter, he was always ready, even eager, to go to bat when he perceived science as being under improper pressures.

In his last annual report to NAS he spoke out strongly. In commenting on Administration-proposed cuts in the NSF budget he wrote, "I must confess a sense of outrage with the notion that [the Office of Management & Budget], rather than appropriate scientists, may dictate which fields of scholarly endeavor are acceptable or important to NSF. Moreover we natural scientists would be ill-advised to stand aside and allow the social scientists to carry the battle. The entirety of science is a seamless web. If the government's science budget can be fashioned by such ideological behavior, which science will be the next to suffer political attack?"

He went on, "If social science can be ordained by OMB to be outside the federal ken, then the way is paved. Creationists and Right to Lifers and the Moral Majority will seek to have education concerning evolution and human reproduction expunged from the secondary schools while exercising pressure to secure removal from appropriations to NSF and NIH of any funds that might be used for research on evolution or reproductive biology"—topics very near to his heart as a most distinguished biologist. For almost 20 years before joining NAS he was chairman of the biochemistry department at Duke University.

He saw science as a seamless web in the international sense also. He perceived restraints on scientists in any nation to pursue their craft and freely communicate their results as an attack on all of science. This put him in the vanguard of efforts to try to mitigate the harrassment and persecution by Soviet authorities of Andrei Sakharov and other dissident Soviet scientists.

There was no stronger foe of the anti-intellectual and antiscience attitudes that seem rife in the land these days than Handler—no stronger advocate of the contributions of science to betterment of the human condition both today and in the future. But he was sensitive to some of the difficulties that science and its applications have helped to bring.

For instance, his concern over the nuclear arms race was intense. He saw U.S. policies on nuclear weapons as the central fact of our national life and was convinced that the scientific community must involve itself in an extensive examination of such policies. His principal regret on leaving the academy was that it removed him from a central role in such an examination. However, his legacy lives on. This month in Washington, D.C., the committee he established to look into arms control and international security will meet for the second time with a counterpart group of Soviet scientists.

NORTH SHORE ELDERLY OUTREACH PROGRAM

HON. JOHN LeBOUTILLIER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. LeBOUTILLIER. Mr. Speaker, the practice of health care is not confined solely to the hospital, outpatient facility, or medicine cabinet. Rather, it is a comprehensive way of life and embraces many types of activities.

Likewise, a hospital is not merely a warehouse for the treatment of the ill. A good hospital maintains a liaison with its former, and potential, as well as current, patients. An excellent way to reduce preventable illnesses, hospital stays, and other health-related misfortunes is through educational outreach programs that are coordinated by the hospital itself.

These programs are especially helpful to the rapidly growing senior segment of our Nation's population. Fortunately, a number of Long Island's fine hospitals have educational liaison programs geared specifically for our senior citizens.

One such example is North Shore Hospital's health education learning program (HELP), which offers comprehensive programs to the elderly in communities such as Manhassett, Port Washington, Great Neck, Herricks, and Roslyn. Since 1980, under the coordination of Louise Mandel, M.A., HELP has been imparting valuable knowledge from the health care field with the help of liaison instructors like Linda Haberman, M.A., North Shore Hospital is encouraged by the program's success.

While preventive health care will not solve all of the problems of adequate health care servicing, it is an important part of this process. North Shore's HELP is an excellent example of such an effort.

I would like to offer the following description of HELP, which appeared in North Shore Hospital's recent newsletter:

SERVICE TO THE ELDERLY AN IMPORTANT OUTREACH ADJUNCT

Community service is as important to hospital staff and administration as the institution's commitment to patient care, medical education and research. The hospital's logo itself graphically demonstrates this co-equal commitment.

Senior citizens in Nassau County are a rapidly growing part of our community. They are a dynamic population with special concerns and needs. "Health, quality of life and the delivery of health care services, become increasingly important to the elderly as they live to older ages," said Louise Mandel, M.A. She is Coordinator of the Office of Health Education which sponsors many of the hospital's outreach programs to senior citizens in Manhasset, Great Neck, Port Washington, Herricks and Roslyn.

"North Shore has a responsibility for educating consumers toward health maintenance and disease prevention," stated Linda Haberman, M.A., health educator who conducts the office's projects for senior citizens. Acting as a liaison between the hospital and the community, "our goal is to assist the medical staff in improving the health of the community through education."

Since 1980 the various outreach activities have been coordinated under the acronym H.E.L.P., for Health Education Learning Program. At the senior citizen sites in towns on the North Shore, programs are presented by Mrs. Haberman, usually in conjunction with an appropriate staff professional from the hospital, complemented by printed handouts and resource lists. More than 2,500 seniors have seen or participated in these education programs.

"The emphasis really is on education rather than direct provision of health services. We try to provide solid, practical information they can use," commented Mrs. Haberman. This can range from how to use the hospital clinics and medical services, to information on doctor-patient communications, diet, nutrition and lifestyle.

What the seniors have been requesting lately, Mrs. Haberman observed, are hospital tours, so that, if they become inpatients or outpatients, their anxieties may be somewhat relieved by their familiarity with hospital procedures and routines.

Response to H.E.L.P. programs has been very favorable so far, with additional centers, in other Long Island communities now requesting this service. Expansion during 1982 is planned.

"As a teaching hospital committed to the senior community on Long Island, North Shore is dedicated to providing health information programs that are accurate, current and relevant to their needs," Mrs. Mandel concluded.●

JOHANNA TRACY

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, the friends of Johanna Tracy came together on December 19, 1981, to pay tribute to her as she retired from her position as lead clerk for the Alameda County Registrar of Voters.

Since Ms. Tracy began with the department on March 26, 1956, she was a highly esteemed, thoughtful, and hardworking employee. Ms. Tracy has trained thousands to work at the polls on election day. WHAT WILL IT TAKE? MANDATED QUOTAS

HON. JOSEPH M. GAYDOS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, over the past decade I have repeatedly taken the floor of this House to express my belief that only mandated quotas, set by Congress, can effectively defend our Nation's basic steel industry—and others—from the depredations of foreign competitors who engaged in unfair trade practices.

These practices are well known: The illegal dumping of steel—selling it below the cost it actually takes to produce it—and the subsidation of an industry by a foreign government whereby it picks up part of the production costs, allow the industry to ship its unemployment to the United States as well as its products.

Calls for quotas to resolve this situation have been brushed aside in the past. International political realities, it has been said, dictated a softer approach to our trade problems. So we had voluntary arrangements, voluntary agreements and negotiated pacts. None worked. None had any teeth. The trigger price mechanism might have but it was never properly administered or enforced. It was no surprise, therefore, when it was suspended for a second time early in January.

However, Mr. Speaker, there are signs the winds of change now are blowing. The idea of quotas no longer is as repugnant to some as it was a few years ago. For example, Donald B. Thompson, Pittsburgh regional editor for Industry Week magazine, addressed the subject of quotas in an article published November 30. He noted that "beyond foreign governments asserting their 'rights to a traditional share' of U.S. markets, negotiations over unfair trade practices have accomplished precious little."

The strategies which stifled the calls for quotas Mr. Thompson described as "dance and stall tactics," adopted in the hope the problems would be short lived. But, he writes, it now is essential to recognize world steel problems as a long-term reality that demands a long-term approach. Given that perspective, he says the quota approach must be reexamined.

Perhaps in a political sense, minuses, (in the quota approach) did once outnumber pluses. Is that really true today?

Mr. Thompson goes on:

The persistent steel problems abroad and the financial inability to expand capacity in this country virtually assure growing U.S. imports. Isn't the real question now, whether they are going to grow on an orderly or a disorderly basis?

That is the question, Mr. Speaker, and quotas are the answer.

The theme for quotas dominated testimony heard by the House Subcommittee on Economic Development, which visited the 20th Congressional District of Pennsylvania in early December. Chaired by our colleague, the Honorable JAMES L. OBERSTAR, the subcommittee was there to learn what impact the problems of domestic steel were having on communities in the area dependent upon it.

Statements to this effect were furnished by prominent representatives of industry, labor, business, and Government. The need for quotas to establish stability in the steel industry was sounded again and again by men such as the Reverend William T. Hogan, professor of economics and director of the Industrial Economic Research Institute at Fordham University; Mr. Thomas Graham, president of Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp.; Lloyd McBride, president of the United Steelworkers of America; Richard P. Simmons, president of Allegheny Ludlum Steel Corp., and Tomas J. Foerster, chairman of the Allegheny County Board of Commissioners.

And, finally, Mr. Speaker, in the January 11 issue of Industry Week magazine Mr. Robert G. Welch, of Welch Research International, former president of the Steel Service Center Institute, discussed the quota question. I will insert Mr. Welch's article, "Scrap TPM: It's Time for Steel Import Quotas," into the RECORD at the close of my remarks but I call your attention to this one paragraph near the close of the item:

Domestic producers will need, at best, a few years to mend the damage done. Imports will be necessary to close the GAP with demand but this should be limited before additional damage is done. They should not exceed 10 percent to 12 percent of the steel consumed in the United States on an all-product basis, and quotas should be established using a 20-year, or possibly, a 30-year time frame.

Mr. Speaker, recent estimates indicate steel imports will have captured 18 to 20 percent of the American steel market in 1981. I ask my colleagues, what other steel producing nation in the world could survive under such a situation, and, for how long?

What will it take to breathe new life, new energy, new stability into the domestic steel industry? The same measures needed years ago, although perhaps the need is more critical than ever, mandated quotas.

[From the Industry Week, Jan. 11, 1982]

SCRAP TPM; IT'S TIME FOR STEEL IMPORT QUOTAS

(By Robert G. Welch)

It's high time to admit that the trigger price mechanism (TPM), which was designed to limit the dumping of foreign steel in this country, never has worked and never will work.

Anyone familiar with modern marketing techniques knows that under a marketing system such as ours, where there is any degree of competition and product diversity, price controls do not work.

The basic fallacy of the TPM is that it is based on price. The TPM was created by well-intentioned bureaucrats who had virtually no insight into the mechanism involved in the marketing of steel products.

Soon, long overdue decisions will have to be made about steel imports. They will be extremely difficult to make because of the ramifications of trade laws; the unwillingness or inability of certain U.S. government officials to enforce them; and the conflicts between international economic, political, and social pressures.

The Administration, Congress, domestic steel producers, metal service centers (that market substantial percentages of foreign and domestic steel), and major users and importers must all contribute their best thinking toward workable solutions to this complicated problem. Solutions should be built around quantitative quotas based on tonnage by country of origin, product, and U.S. geographical area. A method of refinement and revision must be worked out to allow for changing economic conditions.

Negotiations should be conducted by government agencies with skilled participants, using techniques similar to those used in GATT.

Voluntary quotas will not work. Quotas should be mandatory. But, above all, whatever method is developed, it will not work unless tons are the controlling determinant.

How did we get into today's dilemma—where foreign steel producers are eating the domestic steel mills for lunch? In the early 1960s, many foreign steel companies expanded capacity beyond the need of their domestic consumers, with the intention of exporting. Much of this capacity was built to penetrate the huge U.S. market.

The chance for the importers to make a beachhead came during the 116-day strike in 1959 and subsequent strike threats in the 1960s. Foreign steel companies used predatory pricing techniques that were highly successful. Typical prices were $25 to $40 a ton below those in the U.S. There is nothing wrong with this technique. It is a tried-and-true method of entering new markets and is used by domestic steel producers on occasion.

However, the rules were changed when foreign producers' predatory pricing techniques were continued with government support by loan guarantees and subsidization in a variety of ways.

As a result, both the basic and specialty steel producers have been deprived of the opportunity to participate in the long-term growth in steel consumption in this country. Without that opportunity, U.S. steel management could not justify necessary research and development, build new plants, modernize existing plants to the extent needed, phase out aging operations and pay for environmental expenditures.

These facts were recognized in the late 1960s. Voluntary quotas were worked out with Japanese and European producers. However, these quotas did not work because foreign producers shifted to higher-valued items, and the agreements regarding geographic distribution were not heeded.

In the early 1970s, when worldwide steel demand exploded, foreign producers cut back on their exports and marked up their U.S. selling prices substantially while U.S. companies were under government price controls. In the mid-seventies, the U.S. again became the export target, and the ill-conceived TPM was installed at the end of 1977.

If the domestic steel producers were permitted to heal the wounds they didn't deserve, they could get shipments in relation to capacity back to levels that permit high employment, attain proper earnings, modernize, and grow with the market. Then they would not be under such intense pressure to diversify, and their major thrust would be the expansion of modern steel production facilities.

Is is any wonder that U.S. Steel is courting Marathon Oil? If U.S. Steel had been permitted to participate in the steel market growth in this country, chances are that thousands of workers would now be constructing the most modern steel plant in the world in Conneaut, Ohio.

The wounds are not confined to the basic steel producers. The whole system is involved. Many service center owners have been forced to sell all or part of their companies to overseas organizations. Foreign producers have established service centers that price their U.S. services below cost. Overseas buying companies have been established to circumvent the TPM.

Domestic producers will need, at best, a few years to mend the damage done. Imports will be necessary to close the gap with demand, but they should be limited before additional damage is done. They should not exceed 10 percent to 12 percent of the steel consumed in the U.S. on an all-product basis, and quotas should be established using a 20- or possibly a 30-year time frame.

All of the old cliches about protectionism, retaliation, and the shifting of imports to products made of steel will be trotted out, but—so long as most of the world's steel mills are government-owned or controlled and subsidized—some sort of quotas will have to exist. They also will probably have to be backed by countervailing duties.●

STEPS TOWARD ECONOMIC GROWTH

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, January 13, 1982, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

STEPS TOWARD ECONOMIC GROWTH

Time and again in the meetings I held in Indiana last week, I was asked about the steps Congress should take to begin a sound economic recovery. There can be no doubt that Hoosiers are being hit hard by the faltering economy. My response to their questions was along these lines:

We have deceived ourselves by thinking that we could have economic gain without pain. Those who said that we could balance the budget, have enormous increases in military spending, enact huge multi-year tax cuts, bring inflation down rapidly, and prompt strong growth in the economy simply by cutting waste and fraud were mistaken. Economic forecasts which are far too optimistic have been the basic problem. Such forecasts have lulled us into thinking that the transition from rising to falling inflation would be easy.

The economy does not work that way. We cannot have it all. We learned that lesson again in 1981. Action to lower the rate of inflation has slowed our economic growth and put thousands of people out of work. Other errors have magnified the effect of bad forecasts: we have opted for too sharp a reduction in the growth of the money supply and a "mechanical" monetary policy which makes the reduction in spite of what happens in the rest of the economy; we have pursued spending and tax programs which may yield the largest deficits in history; the mix of tight monetary policy and enormous deficits has pushed interest rates to record levels.

What we need now are economic programs which give us a better balance between fiscal and monetary policies. Most of us believe that there is great strength in the economy and that, with the right mix of fiscal and monetary policies, the future is good. Without major adjustments in policy, however, the economy may soon get worse. Tight monetary policy and huge deficits doom the economy to stagnation, but economic growth would be enhanced by a tough fiscal policy (which moved the budget decisively toward balance and eventually into surplus) in conjunction with a relatively accommodating monetary policy. We would have lower interest rates and better access to capital markets for homebuyers, small businessmen, and farmers. A lower rate of inflation could not be far behind.

What must we do? The economic steps which I suggest are not easy.

1. Balancing the budget.—We must put the budget on a narrow path toward balance. I am not among those who believe that the budget must be balanced every year of absolute necessity, but the practice of the recent past and the deficits anticipated for the next several years are simply unacceptable. Unless we correct the deficits, we will be in trouble. The deficits mean that interest rates will remain high (they are falling now only because of the recession); investment will be minimal and the housing and automobile markets will remain depressed. Also, the deficits spur inflation both psychologically and by congesting markets for credit. I disagree with those who have argued in recent days that "deficits don't matter."

2. Trimming back spending for defense and entitlements.—Defense and entitlements should not be exempt from budget discipline. I wish that we could exempt them, but we cannot. Defense, entitlements, and interest on the national debt swallow 75 percent of the budget. Only 25 percent is left over for discretionary programs, which have already been cut sharply. Real growth in defense must be reduced to at least 5 percent from the 7 percent the President has demanded. Budget Director David Stockman has said that there is $30 billion in waste in the Pentagon's budget. We should take him at his word and go after it. The growth of budgets for entitlements must also be reduced, but not by cuts in the benefits of today's recipients or those soon to be recipients. Instead, we should consider gradually raising the retirement age over a period of decades and trimming back cost-of-living increases which overstate inflation and outstrip worker's gains in wages. One other word about spending cuts is in order. To maintain the impetus behind them, they must be perceived by the people as fair and evenly distributed. We have not achieved this objective so far. Spending cuts should not be assaults on weak constituencies. Rather, they should be part of a coherent strategy to streamline government.

3. Holding firm of discretionary spending.—Discretionary spending, most of it in federal grants to state and local governments, probably cannot be reduced further because the fiscally hard-pressed states and cities have already borne a disproportionate share of the budget cuts. Such spending, however, should be frozen at present levels.

4. Lowering interest rates.—The Federal Reserve must act to end inflation at the lowest possible cost. The risk is that the Fed is holding the growth of the money supply too low and is deepening the recession. The Fed should aim for a low-inflation recovery, which probably means that it should maintain the same ranges for growth in the money supply but aim for the middle or the top of the ranges. It should not tighten money as it plans to in 1982. A less restrictive monetary policy coupled with a tighter fiscal policy should cause interest rates to fall without a new spirit of inflation. We are not near full employment, and the nation's industry has much excess capacity.

5. Curbing tax expenditures.—The loss of revenue through "loopholes" in the tax code—tax expenditures—now totals $250 billion per year. Tax expenditures cannot be exempt from scrutiny, and many of them must be ended. I would try to recoup at least $50 billion from these sources.

6. Increasing other taxes.—Besides closing tax "loopholes", we have the question of other tax increases. Like most people, I would like to avoid such increases. If the other steps I have suggested are taken, I would hope that they would not be necessary. However, if the deficits cannot be closed in any other way, my choice would be one or more of several options, including a deferral of tax cuts scheduled to take effect on 1983, a tax on deregulated natural gas, or a hike in excise taxes or user fees.●

FENWICK MARRIAGE PENALTY LEGISLATION

HON. BARBER B. CONABLE, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, it has come to my attention that beginning with the first paychecks being received this month, many two-worker married couples are reducing their Federal income tax withholding. They ought to thank the gentlewoman from New Jersey, Mrs. FENWICK, for it was largely through her indefatigable efforts that the tax law was at long last changed to reduce the income tax marriage penalty.

Mrs. FENWICK took up the cause of the many taxpayers who had to pay this extra levy practically from the first day she came to this body. Through her persistent efforts, with the press, with her colleagues, and with the Ways and Means Committee, the issue came to national prominence, was cosponsored by over half the House, and last year the special exemption system was made law.

As the ranking minority member of the Ways and Means Committee, I can attest that Mrs. FENWICK, through her hard work and initiative, showed her understanding for the large number of taxpayers affected by the penalty and demonstrated her keen sense of fair play and equity. With more and more married men and women entering the work force, we should express our gratitude to Mrs. FENWICK, for her efforts to reduce the penalty and make our tax laws fairer.●

GOODBY ST. LOUIS, HELLO PARIS

HON. CARDISS COLLINS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mrs. COLLINS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I rise to call the attention of the House to an article which was printed in the November/December issue of Think magazine, a publication distributed to the employees of the International Business Machines Corp. (IBM).

The article features Earl Wilson, who is the father of my legislative assistant, Denise Wilson, and the cousin of our colleague, the Honorable WILLIAM CLAY of the First Congressional District of Missouri.

I am inserting this article so that it may be available to young men and women across this country and serve as guidance and inspiration as they seek to achieve their life's goals.

The Reagan administration is attempting to dismantle and dilute affirmative action and contract compliance provisions in favor of moral quotas. I am sure Earl Wilson would agree that if it had not been for the marches and the protests in the 1960's and the subsequent implementation of affirmative action programs, the Earl Wilsons of our society may not have even been looked at for entry into the corporate arena.

I sincerely hope that we will not be witness to the destruction of contract compliance and affirmative action programs on any level, corporate or otherwise, because, in the words of the United Negro College Fund: "A mind is a terrible thing to waste."

The article follows:

GOODBY ST. LOUIS, HELLO PARIS

(By Harrison Kinney)

The prospect had never seen anything like it. One minute the IBM salesman was sitting across from his desk pointing out how

IBM typewriters might help his business. The next minute the salesman had leaped out of his chair, dashed out to his car and was in hot pursuit of a car filled with teenagers.

This was St. Louis, 1964, and Earl Wilson, IBM's first black sales representative in Missouri, had seen his car robbed of a suitcase and other articles. At the second traffic light, he was able to block the other car with his own, confront its occupants and recover the stolen articles. He also recognized two of them as younger brothers of former friends from his old neighborhood—"downtown" St. Louis.

Wilson stayed in touch with the two long after the incident, persuading them to go back to school. Both finished college. Today, one is an attorney, the other a businessman. Both are quick to credit Earl Wilson with providing the help needed at a critical time in their lives.

"There were those who helped me when I used to get in just that kind of trouble," Wilson says. "I feel the obligation to do the same."

Earl Wilson has come a long way from St. Louis. He manages IBM Europe's market support of independent dealers in Arab and African countries who sell IBM office products. He also oversees OP operations in Pakistan.

Wilson lives in the fashionable 16th Arrondissement, on Rue Antoine Boucher, with his wife, Marjorie, a Lincoln University classmate from Jefferson City, Mo., his daughters Kim, a sophomore in high school at The American School of Paris, and Stacey, a sophomore in The American College. (The oldest daughter, Denise, is in Washington, D.C., assistant to Congresswoman Cardiss Collins of Illinois.)

SHOES AND GLOVES

However cosmopolitan Wilson may have become, he still enjoys visiting his old neighborhood in St. Louis and talking to the young people there.

He makes it clear to them that he understands their frequent bitterness at the lack of opportunity. "But you can't change the system when you're outside it," he says. "You have to work within it, even though there are times when it seems it will never work for you."

Nobody in his young audiences doubts that Earl Wilson knows what he's talking about. One of five children raised by this mother, Wilson went to work shining shoes when he was 10 years old to help her. His neighborhood was one in which he had to learn to fight to survive. He took up boxing at age 13, eventually winning the regional Golden Gloves championship and 63 of 66 fights.

Acting on his high school teachers' advice, he attended Stowe Teachers College in West St. Louis. He worked odd jobs for the black middle-class doctors, lawyers and schoolteachers in that area and was impressed by their homes. "My first real incentive to do something with my life," he says, "was seeing those houses—indoor plumbing, instant hot and cold water, front lawns. Mundane things, but they defined my sense of the possible."

MAKING THINGS HAPPEN

After a year at Stowe, Wilson set off for Lincoln University in Jefferson City, Mo., in the fall of 1952 with $50 and his possessions in a small cardboard box with a rope around it. If he now enjoys a reputation at Lincoln as an alumnus who has worked hard over the years to improve curricula, faculty compensation and facilities, it results from his sense of gratitude to the school. There he earned a degree in history and industrial art; there he met and married a classmate; and there, through Lincoln's R.O.T.C., he won a second lieutenant's commission in the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers.

He spent six years in the Army, attaining the rank of captain and commanding a heavy equipment company in Germany. In 1963, IBM, in its effort to increase minority hiring, obtained Wilson's name from Lincoln University. He accepted a job offer as sales trainee with the Electric Typewriter Division's St. Louis branch and was given a territory that was part of his old neighborhood.

Wilson followed the advice he gives to young people: "The only thing you can hope to be given is an opportunity. It's up to you to use it to make things happen, and that's never easy."

He made things happen, meeting his sales quotas for eight straight years. He was married and had three daughters by then, but he spent as much time as he could working with the young people of his old neighborhood.

His "role model," he says, was his cousin, Irving Clay, now director of welfare for St. Louis. "Irving was a playground supervisor and coach of our softball team," Wilson remembers. "I was the catcher, and we were three days away from the St. Louis championship game. Irving was a strict disciplinarian. Once, instead of turning up for practice, I went swimming. The day of the championship game, Irving used a substitute instead of me as my punishment. We lost the game while I sat on the sidelines. It was a lesson I never forgot. When you make a commitment, you keep it."

ON THE MARKETING MARK

Wilson accepted the job of managing the Office Products Division's Equal Opportunity Program in 1968, half suspecting it might be a "cosmetic" job. Two people in particular convinced him otherwise and continue to hold Wilson's highest respect: Gordon Moodie, former head of OPD, and B. J. Johnson, then the division's director of personnel and now IBM director of employee relations.

That EOP experience led to a job offer from a larger company that had just lost a government contract through non-compliance with EOP requirements. "My job would have been fixing the problem," he says, "but I didn't want to become either a trouble-shooter or an EOP professional. I wanted to get back into marketing, for two reasons: First, I like selling. Second, marketing is an area denied to blacks for years, and one way to encourage them to sell was to go on showing that a black could do it."

He got his wish in 1970, returning to St. Louis as an assistant branch manager. Under IBM's Executive Loan Program, he served for a year at Lincoln University, helping to raise hundreds of thousands of dollars improving faculty salaries and retirement programs. He went on to become branch manager in Washington, D.C., led his branch to a regional award for best performance and in 1974 was named Regional Branch Manager of the Year.

After three years with the General Business Group/International Division, he went to IBM Europe, where he oversaw OP operations in some of the non-GBG countries.

Last May, Earl Wilson, who nearly 30 years ago left home for Jefferson City and Lincoln University with his belongings in a cardboard box, returned to the University to accept an honorary Doctor of Letters degree. "It all began here, really," he told the audience that day, "with professors who invested more time and patience in helping me than could reasonably have been expected of them. I hope to repay them by helping others."●

BRAVERY RECALLED: NEW HYDE PARK PAYS TRIBUTE

HON. JOHN LeBOUTILLIER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. LeBOUTILLIER. Mr. Speaker, in the early hours of New Year's Day 1942, a recently provisioned B-25 bomber aircraft took off from Long Island's Mitchell Field. The aircraft's mission was a simple training one, but training efforts were reaching nationwide intensity due to the fact that the United States had gone to war 3 weeks before.

Almost from the moment that the aircraft's wheels left the tarmac, trouble started to brew. Aware of the smoking port engine and the inevitable debilitation that any engine damage would cause when flying this two-engined craft, pilot Charles W. Van Ecuwen tried to bring the plane back for an emergency landing. While making the turn, the engine failure became unmanageable and the plane could not gain sufficient altitude for a return to Mitchell Field.

This emergency was occurring over the relatively heavily populated area of Garden City Park, N.Y., where rows of suburban homes dotted the land below. In the final stages of the flight, Van Ecuwen realized that a sand pit that had been used for excavation was looming ahead. He determined that this pit offered his only chance of preventing a disastrous crash. The pilot aimed for the pits to avoid killing any civilians. The aircraft struck the pits and the five men on board were killed—early heroes of World War II.

This little known act of uncommon bravery is commemorated by a plaque. A simple but evocative stone has been placed and is maintained by the residents and veterans groups in the area.

George J. Schrader, of the Hillside Park Civic Association, was a leader in the erection of the memorial plaque. Each year, the American Legion and the Veterans of Foreign Wars hold services at the monument to commemorate the selfless decision of pilot Van Ecuwen and his crew.

This year marks the 40th anniversary of this heroic act and, shortly before the first of the year, Mr. Schrader, veterans organizations and the town of North Hempstead presented a special tribute. Mr. Schrader and Frank Pistone, commissioner of community services for the town of North

Hempstead, led other leaders and residents in a special commemoration of this uncommon act of heroism.

Rev. Rolf Hansen, of the Community Congregational Church of New Hyde Park, N.Y., led the invocation. Father John T. Uris, of New Hyde Park's Notre Dame Roman Catholic Church, led a prayer for the deceased. North Hempstead Supervisor Michael Tully, Jr., placed a memorial wreath and Rabbi David Powers, of Temple Emanuel in New Hyde Park, said the benediction.

Others who helped prepare this moving and special tribute were the Historical Society of North Hempstead; Mrs. Helen Vajada of the Hillside Oaks Garden Club; Mrs. Maura Rossi of the Hillside Oaks Civic Association; Mrs. Florence George of Garden City Park, N.Y.; Garden City Park Fire Commissioner Robert Banks; Inspector Otto Geiger of the Nassau County Police Department; Mr. Michael Wallace of the National Bank of North America; Barbara Jansen, Gertrude Schoppman, George Richmond, Barbara Yevoli, Angela Powers, Francis Wilson, and Edwin "Buddy" Koss of the North Hempstead Glee Club, under the direction of Robert Valli, North Hempstead Receiver of Taxes; and Joseph Dowling, Jr., of the town's finance department.

Last, but most important, this RECORD must reflect the names of the brave airmen who perished on January 1, 1942: Lt. Charles W. Van Ecuwen, Allandale, Mich.; Lt. James Orr, Oak Park, Ill.; Cadet Earl Ray, Kings Mill, Ohio; Pfc. Edwin Onufrowicz, Newburyport, Mass.; and Pfc. Joseph Gallok, Pittsburgh, Pa.

These men died so that other might live.●

TRIBUTE TO NAVAJO CODE TALKERS

HON. BILL CHAPPELL, JR.

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. CHAPPELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a group of loyal Americans who unselfishly served their country in World War II. The group, which has become known as the "Navajo Code Talkers" was comprised of approximately 420 American Indians who used their native tongues to confound enemy eavesdropping attempts and thus secure allied communications. In many instances this duty called for these courageous individuals to locate themselves in front-line headquarters and indeed on the front lines, with little regard for personal safety.

Accordingly, I hope my colleagues will join me in recognizing the unique and vital contribution made by these Americans to the victorious U.S. effort in World War II.●

REPRESSION OF POLES FAR WORSE THAN INDICATED

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Cord Meyer, a syndicated columnist, has applied his special insights to the situation in Poland. In a column, appearing in the Baltimore Evening Sun on December 24, 1981, Mr. Meyer reported facts not widely known about events in Poland. He reminds us that Romuald Spasowski, former Polish Ambassador to Washington who defected in the wake of the imposition of martial law in Poland, gave us this message: "Whatever the future will be, don't be silent, Americans * * * Show your solidarity * * *."

Read what Mr. Meyer had to say.

[From the Baltimore Evening Sun, Dec. 24, 1981]

REPRESSION OF POLES FAR WORSE THAN INDICATED

(By Cord Meyer)

WASHINGTON.—The iron curtain of censorship and communication control that has clashed shut around Poland has not only made resistance more difficult by isolating the Polish people one from another. It has also largely hidden from public view the full dimensions of this human tragedy and muted the protest of the outside world.

But reliable witnesses are beginning to make good their escape to the West, including returning Polish-Americans. Their reporting taken together with the testimony of the Polish ambassador to the U.S. who has just defected adds up to a picture far different from the one Gen. Jaruzelski's junta would have us believe.

Contrary to regime assurances that only the top leadership of Solidarity is being detained, mass arrests are reported to have thrown more than 40,000 political prisoners into detention camps that were built for this use weeks ago. These prisoners, including the cream of Poland's cultural elite as well as Solidarity organizers, are being held under such conditions of hunger and cold that some may not survive.

Beyond the regime's admission of seven deaths among the striking miners in Silesia, eyewitness reports state that many more have been killed, and a woman hospital patient has testified that she saw wounded miners dragged from their hospital beds and beaten by communist goon squads.

Poland's conscript army has been deliberately spared direct participation in this "normalization" for fear that it might refuse to carry out such orders. When army patrols have cordoned off a striking factory, the specially-trained internal security forces armed with tanks storm the factory gates. The final brutal assault on the strikers is conducted by the dreaded ZOMO. These initials stand for motorized units of citizens militia, which are in fact gangs of criminal thugs hired by the regime.

Recently-arrived travelers from Poland completely agree with the former Polish ambassador when he stated. "This carefully-orchestrated and directed crackdown is not an internal Polish issue." According to reports that both Reagan officials and American intelligence take seriously the joint planning for this operation between the Soviet and Polish high commands began as early as Gen. Jaruzelski's appointment as prime minister last February.

The Polish Communist Party seems to have been excluded from this operational planning. With Gen. Jaruzelski acting as a disciplined subordinate, the Warsaw Pact commander, Soviet Marshall Viktor Kulikov, is reported to have established a special Russian staff in Warsaw last summer to oversee every scrupulous detail of the advance planning.

Under these circumstances, the question of whether this was a Polish or Russian operation becomes a distinction without a difference. In order to avoid the heavy costs of overt use of Russian troops. Gen. Jaruzelski obeyed the orders of his Warsaw Pact commander and did the Russians' work for them. NATO strategy that had been directed at deterring an open Soviet invasion was left without its main target and the Reagan administration has been grappling with the ambiguity of an intervention by proxy.

This time, the communist rulers did not repeat the mistakes that allowed the Solidarity movement to grow last year from a few isolated strikes into an organization of 10 million members. By seizing total control of all means of communication, the regime broke the link between Solidarity leaders and foreign correspondents this previously had allowed accurate information to flow abroad, from whence it was broadcast back into Poland by Radio Free Europe (RFE).

By an unprecedented concentration of skywave jammers in Russia against RFE broadcasts into Poland, the Soviets are now trying to break this last link. Responding to refugee pleas for increased transmitter strength, RFE is shifting additional transmitters to the Polish target.

As the enormity of what is happening in Poland begins to dawn on the Western world, the Reagan administration is being compelled to go beyond verbal condemnation to consider more effective methods. To withhold economic sanctions against Russia in order to deter an invasion that may never occur makes no sense if the Soviets are able to destroy Polish freedoms through their control of proxy forces.

But even though the brutality of Jaruzelski's junta becomes increasingly apparent, hesitant NATO allies will not follow unless they are decisively led. Selective sanctions against both Russia and Poland that allow food relief through church channels to the Poles are only possible if President Reagan rises to the occasion.

In the meanwhile, the ex-Polish ambassador, Romuald Spasowski, had a Christmas message for us all in his final statement, "Whatever the future will be, don't be silent, Americans. To defend freedom is in your tradition. Show your solidarity, show your support and humanitarian assistance to those who are in such need at this hour."●

PLANNING IS NOT ENOUGH

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, I commend to my colleagues an editorial concerning the Export-Import Bank which appeared in today's issue of Business Week. I concur completely with the arguments and conclusions presented by the author of this piece. The only thing we will do by cutting Eximbank lending authority is shoot ourselves in the foot at a time when we should be doing all we can to encourage jobs.

At this time of near-record postwar unemployment, I strongly encourage my colleagues to consider the importance of and the need for a strong Eximbank.

The editorial follows:

THE NEED TO EXPORT

The Reagan Administration's deep new cut in the Export-Import Bank's lending authority for fiscal 1983 is seriously shortsighted. One result will be that many thousands of jobs will be lost in this country, perhaps for good. Beyond that, this budget cut risks hobbling key high-technology industries whose health and growth are vital to the growth and prosperity, and even the security, of the U.S. in an increasingly competitive world.

To survive, many important high-technology industries must export. But in trying to sell their products abroad, they face vigorous competition from foreign rivals that enjoy substantial subsidies from their own governments. Lacking similar subsidies, U.S. companies are severely handicapped, and, more important, the U.S. economy suffers. The nuclear power industry offers the most dramatic example of what is happening: It continues to be restricted in this country by political and ecological restraints. Its counterpart industry in France faces no such restrictions at home and has moved ahead to increase capacity and improve technology. To compete against French industry in such potential markets as Spain, Mexico, Taiwan, and South Korea, U.S. nuclear power manufacturers would have to be able to utilize hundreds of millions of dollars of export credits at terms down to 5%. When they lose initial contracts, they also lose follow-up business.

Administration officials offer various excuses for cutting back on Ex-Im, but when pushed some of them concede that the U.S. may eventually, have to match the subsidized export credit other industrialized nations provide their high-technology industries. But they plead for more time to negotiate international agreements to curb export credit subsidies.

The next round of negotiations with France and other industrialized nations is scheduled for February. Before the U.S. sits down at the table, the Administration should signal clearly that unless it gets a fair agreement it is prepared to match the export credits of other countries dollar for dollar, interest point for interest point. Without such drastic action, the U.S. will see more and more business and jobs going to foreign competitors.●

WHAT IS THE U.S. ROLE IN SPACE?

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to discuss a matter of great importance, but of which there is little public awareness, the upcoming United Nations Conference on the Exploration and Peaceful Use of Outer Space.

A few weeks ago, the Reagan administration recommitted the United States as a participant in the second United Nations Conference on the Exploration and Peaceful Uses of Outer Space—Unispace 1982—to be held this August in Vienna, Austria. Even though work on this conference had been going on for 7 years, the presumption that the United States would participate was changed by the Reagan administration, and for most of the past year, no U.S. preparations have occurred. Thus, the United States is going to be entering a major international conference in a field where we are presumed to be the world leader with probably less preparation than for any other United Nations Conference since its creation. This startling fact is reason enough for those interested in the U.S. role in space to pay special attention to this subject.

The U.S. role in recent international and United Nations conferences has not been exemplary. Our Nation's conference goals seem to increasingly be the simple saving of grace, rather than the articulation of goals, policies, and programs befitting a world power whose political philosophy is based on universal principles. Our leadership in space has opened great opportunities for all the peoples of the world. The United States can be proud of what it has done in sharing the benefits of space advances with others, whether in meteorology, communications, or basic sciences. We can and should do more, which is what Unispace 1982 should be about.

Unfortunately, there is another direction developments in space can go. Some in the military, in this country, and in the Soviet Union see the militarization, or more accurately, the weaponization of space as inevitable and desirable. It is also inevitable that the question of an arms race in space will be a major topic at Unispace 1982.

The U.N. Conference on the Peaceful Uses of Space is not the only U.N. conference in 1982. The Law of the Sea Treaty sessions continue, with the question of the U.S. role again being paramount. The Special Session on Disarmament will also meet again, where a report on the French proposal to establish an international peacekeeping satellite surveillance system will probably be further considered. Finally, there is no way to avoid the issues which are being discussed in the World Administrative Radio Conference (WARC), since many of the key unresolved issues from WARC relate to satellite communications in one way or another.

Like all recent U.N. conferences and international meetings, the North-South dialog will continue. With the exception of the incredible lack of preparation within the United States for this conference, the United States approaches Unispace '82 as it approached the United Nations Conference on Science and Technology for Development (UNCSTD), which was held in Vienna in 1979. As one who was closely involved with that conference, I understood the reluctance of U.S. policymakers to come forth with constructive proposals. While I did not agree with that reluctance—and eventually the United States was far more forthcoming that it was prepared to be even a few days before the conference—I can attest to the fact that even those small concessions took tremendous work to obtain.

Mr. Speaker, at this time, I will not go into detail about what posture the United States should have at Unispace '82. We obviously need to reaffirm our support for the Outer Space Treaty of 1967 and the ABM Treaty, both of which relate to the weaponization of space. We need to continue our policy of sharing Landsat data, and other basic information. We need to broaden our commitment to improving communications and navigation satellites and sharing those precious resources with others. We also need to further the transfer of knowledge and technology to others, to help developing nations help themselves.

I personally believe we should do much more. I believe it is time to demystify intelligence satellites and share the information from those superb technologies with all the peoples of the world. Obviously this proposal, involving our most sensitive secrets, would need considerable deliberation. Perhaps we could start by endorsing the French proposal at the Special Session on Disarmament and encouraging a separate—and maybe even equal—international satellite surveillance system.

Regardless of what one thinks the U.S. role in space should be, he or she should be concerned about the fact that the United States has no space policy, and is not prepared for the U.N. Space Conference to be held this August. I intend to devote considerable effort to try to remedy this problem.●

HON. NORMAN D. SHUMWAY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, the one issue which has most concerned and upset my constituents over the past few weeks is the series of tax exemptions for Members of Congress approved shortly before adjournment.

Although I voted against H.R. 5159, which expanded upon the tax breaks previously approved as part of the first and second continuing resolutions, the bill nevertheless passed by an overwhelming margin of 363 to 47. In my view, and in the view of my constituents, the granting of tax deductions so large as to potentially exempt many Members from the payment of Federal income taxes altogether is entirely the wrong signal at a time when we are asking the American people to make sacrifices so that broad economic recovery can be achieved.

Moreover, I found the procedure involved in the passage of these benefits to be inappropriate, manipulative and wrong. The bill in question originally sought to address the needs of black lung victims, not to act as a vehicle of self service for those casting the votes. Under other procedural circumstances, and to a less drastic degree, I might well have considered supporting the expansion of work-related tax exemptions for Members of Congress. However, this particular effort was so badly contrived as to demand rejection, in my opinion.

While I am keenly aware of the burdens imposed on many Members, particularly as a result of the need to maintain two homes, our constituents face unique and difficult financial problems of their own. And, quite frankly, they for the most part have not been offered tax breaks nearly as attractive as those we voted for ourselves. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation to repeal all of the recently enacted deductions, and to reinstate the traditional $3,000 limit on work-related expenses which can be claimed by Members of Congress.●

SENATOR HART ON ARMS CONTROL: VITAL TO OUR NATIONAL SECURITY

HON. MORRIS K. UDALL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to my colleagues' attention an excellent speech on nuclear proliferation delivered by my very able colleague, Senator GARY HART of Colorado. Senator HART spoke at Cornell University on November 1, 1981, before a convocation on the "Threat of Nuclear War". His address appears below.

Mr. Speaker, limitations on nuclear weapons unquestionably represent an important part of our national defense for two reasons. First, these limitations allow us to control the arms race while also placing a restraint on our Soviet rivals. Second, an arms limitation treaty helps reduce the costs of an arms race that burdens both nation's economies. We must remember that a strong economy is crucial to our national security, too.

America should put her energy and investment into those elements of the current nuclear and conventional forces which are deficient. By assuring that what we have works and that it is appropriate to the kinds of conflicts we may encounter, we can do the most to further peace, promote security, and stablize the superpower rivalry.

The only effective way to deal with nuclear proliferation is through direct negotiations with our rivals. I have written the President recently and urged the resumption of the SALT/START talks, and these appear to be going forward. These are an important complement to the current negotiations limiting the short-range nuclear weapons based in Europe.

Mr. Speaker, Senator HART's speech is an excellent statement of the challenges and opportunities ahead of the United States, and I commend it in its entirety:

ADDRESS BY SENATOR GARY HART, CONVOCATION ON THE THREAT OF NUCLEAR WAR

I am honored to be part of this nationwide convocation on the prevention of nuclear war. There is no more important issue before our society.

For nearly forty years, nuclear weapons have posed the gravest threat to our security; today, they are becoming an immediate threat to our survival.

For nearly forty years, nuclear weapons have had the power to render war unthinkable; today, there are those who think about a limited nuclear war—and think it can be won.

For nearly forty years, our nation has sought to lead the world away from the abyss of nuclear war; today we have managed—incredibly—to cast aside that sense of purpose.

Today there are almost no constraints on the nuclear arms race between the superpowers. The spread of nuclear weapons worldwide is unchecked. And major governments lack the will to pull us back from the edge of the nuclear abyss.

These developments are incompatible with the security of America; they are incompatible with the dream of America; and they are incompatible with the survival of America.

I would like to ask two questions. First, how many of you here today were alive when we dropped the Hiroshima bomb? Would you raise your hands? Now, the second question: How many of you remember air raid drills in your schools—huddling in basements or under your desks?

Very few of you remember. But American leaders who knew war—who led men in battle and saw men die—saw nuclear weapons tested and used and were awed. They thought nuclear arms would make war itself impossible. In General Douglas MacArthur's words:

"This very triumph of scientific annihilation—this very success of invention—has destroyed the possibility of war's being a medium for the practical settlement of international differences. . . . Global war has become a Frankenstein to destroy both sides. No longer is it a weapon of adventure—the shortcut to international power. If you lose, you are annihilated. If you win, you stand only to lose . . . [war] contains now only the germs of double suicide."

Remember those words. And remember they were spoken at a time when the U.S. and Soviet Union, combined, measured their strategic weapons in the hundreds. Today, our two nations together have about 20,000 each more powerful than the Hiroshima bomb. Then, most were carried on slow-moving bombers that could be recalled. Now, most are on missiles—weapons on a hair-trigger. Now, 30 minutes or less lie between launch and irrevocable destruction.

Who can comprehend the meaning of tens of millions dead?

Who can comprehend millions more severly burned, unable to reach hospitals that, at best, might care for one thousand nationwide?

Who can comprehend still millions more blinded, wandering sightless in a post-attack world, simply because they looked up when the first flash came?

And who can comprehend rebuilding such a society—not just repairing physical injury, but restoring a sense of order in a world ruled by mobs, struggling over scraps of food, with no reason for human restraint?

Faced with this dark vision, no one should think lightly of nuclear war. Just as important, none of us can refuse to think about it at all.

If we refuse to think about it, we entrust our survival to think-tank theoretician with pocket-size bomb damage calculators.

If we refuse to think about it, we entrust our survival to those who believe nuclear war can be neat and clean—who believe nuclear war would merely throw our economy back to the 1920s—who believe nuclear weapons permit such a thing as a surgical strike.

If we refuse to think about it, we entrust our survival to leaders who believe that limited nuclear war can be fought and won—and who might act on that belief.

The idea of limited nuclear war is an attempt to rationalize insanity.

Yet fantasies of limited nuclear war are embraced at the highest councils of our government. They are now driving our weapons decisions—like the decision to build the neutron bomb which could lower the threshold of nuclear war. They are fragmenting our NATO alliance while the Soviet threat in Poland and Afghanistan demands more than ever that we stand as one. They are allowing the Soviet Union to pose as a leader for peace, and to portray us as an obstacle to peace.

And, while a few leaders indulge in these fantasies, other nations dream other nightmares. No longer are there two nations that possess the power of ultimate destruction; now there are six. In a decade, there may be ten or twenty or more. And can anyone say with confidence that Iraq or Libya or Pakistan will show restraint in the use of a nuclear weapon?

And what of the terrorist groups now active in many of the world's nations? Nuclear terrorism is the new nightmare that haunts us—not nation making war on nation, but an isolated terrorist group imposing its will on the world.

Not armies of scientists working with ultrasecret technologies, but a few individuals building a nuclear bomb with some basic physics and a few pounds of plutonium.

Not weapons hurled thousands of miles on complex rockets—but one container in an abandoned warehouse in an American or European or Israeli city.

This is the ultimate nuclear nightmare—and, too soon, we may drift into it, never to awake.

So it is time to wake those who believe nuclear war simply can never happen. It is time to wake those who ignore the lessons of past civilizations—civilizations which, like us, dreamed they would last forever.

Such belief today is more than harmless dreaming—it is sheer arrogance.

It is sheer arrogance to believe the United States and Soviet Union can increase their nuclear forces beyond any rational level, and still expect other nations to forego these weapons themselves.

It is sheer arrogance to talk of exploding a nuclear bomb as a demonstration of strength, and expect our allies and adversaries not to be concerned.

It is sheer arrogance to believe that arms can be piled on arms without consequence—this on a globe where once distant countries are today's neighbors, where the weapons we have today will be the weapons others have tomorrow.

It is sheer arrogance to believe we can promote the spread of nuclear materials around the globe and not one day see the Fifth Horseman of nuclear terrorism ride upon some American or European or Israeli city.

All this is sheer arrogance and it is dangerous arrogance. So it is time to reawaken all our leaders to their most solemn responsibility—the prevention of nuclear war.

It will take a supreme effort of national and international will to carry us safely to the twenty-first century. If we are to make this effort, we must first banish three pervasive errors.

The first error is that controlling nuclear weapons amounts to being soft on national security. Arms limitations enhance our national security. They are checks on our adversaries, not rewards to our friends. And to the precise extent arms control agreements limit the size of the Soviet force, they are essential to our national security.

The second error is that unilateral disarmament holds our best hope for averting nuclear war. In my view, such a course would lead to the war we seek to prevent. It would encourage dangerous miscalculations by adversaries we seek to deter. The profound paradox of our time still stands—the very terror and certainty of these weapons is necessasry to prevent their use.

The third error is that the spread of nuclear weapons throughout the world is an issue separate and distinct from the superpower arms race. In fact, the two are intimately related. We cannot demand restraint from other nations while we act without restraint ourselves. Each time a new country joins the nuclear club, efforts at worldwide arms control are seriously complicated and the threat of nuclear terrorism is increased.

I would like to stand before you and offer a magic formula to end the nuclear arms race and prevent the outbreak of nuclear war. The simple truth is that there is no simple plan. We are dealing with decades of mutual suspicion. We are dealing with a powerful technological momentum that drives both sides. And we are dealing with the gruesome desire of many countries to assert their national pride with deadly weapons.

So far, the struggle to overcome these obstacles has been an unequal fight, for we, as a nation, have not confronted the problem of nuclear war. Fewer than one thousand Americans in government and universities are working actively to reduce nuclear arms. One thousand times their number are working to build them.

It is time to apply the full strength of our nation to the byzantine nuclear threat. There are common-sense steps to be taken—steps that will once more put us on course toward peace.

The first step is to direct our nation's military policies to the prevention of nuclear war.

This means judging our weapons by a new standard—will they increase or decrease the risk of nuclear war.

It means improved nuclear command and control so we never use nuclear weapons in ignorance of error.

It means building verifiability into our weapons so we can negotiate arms control agreements based on mutual knowledge, not mutual trust.

It means better intelligence collection so our national defense decisions rest on information, not speculation.

And it means strong conventional armed forces, so nuclear weapons are the last line of defense, not the first.

The second step is to resume serious negotiations with the Soviet Union. And we must reorient the purpose of those negotiations—away from the numbers game that has become an end in itself and back to the original goal, the prevention of nuclear war.

Reducing the numbers of arms is not an unimportant goal, but it is insufficient. It must be butteressed by measures that pull the two sides apart, in space and in time, to reduce the incentive to use these weapons in some future crisis. Europe provides a good example. If the coming negotiations on nuclear on hair trigger alert, then they will have failed.

For, whatever the numbers, those missiles are on a hairtrigger. Their short flight time provides a powerful incentive for shooting first and asking questions later. To remove that hair-trigger, we must negotiate to move Soviet missiles out of range of Western Europe. In return for this, we could consider not placing our own missiles on Europe soil. To use these weapons, each side would have to move them within range of Europe. This would provide a cooling-off period—a firebreak, if you will—and lessen the chances of nuclear war.

These measures will never be achieved until we decide we must talk—and talk seriously.

That word "seriously" is fundamental. For officials in both governments may devise proposals that sound like progress, but are really constructed to prevent any progress at all. And our discussions are doomed to remain discussions—unless both sets of leaders are committed to reducing the chance of war.

Unfortunately, we haven't even negotiated on strategic arms with the Soviets since the SALT II Treaty was signed in 1979. And the current Administration does not plan to resume talks on strategic limitations until next spring. This is too long to wait. It's time—now—to resume arms negotiations. Whatever the difficulties of reaching agreement, the dangers of not trying are worse.

The third step on a course toward peace is a tough, determined policy to prevent the further spread of nuclear weapons. Our ability to develop such a policy rests on our willingness to stop our international trade in nuclear technology.

For three decades, we have tried to maintain a distinction between peaceful and military uses of nuclear energy. The fact is, no such distinction exists. There is only a thin line of technology. And we and other world nuclear suppliers are edging closer and closer to that line.

For example, today's nuclear reactors have produced about 140 tons of plutonium—enough to make 28,000 Nagasaki-sized bombs. So far, most of that plutonium is locked in spent nuclear reactor fuel. But the technology to unlock it exists, and several nations, including Libya, are trying to buy it.

What assurances do we have that the separated plutonium would be used in conventional nuclear plants—and not in weapons? None.

And what assurances do we have that plutonium will not find its way to terrorists bent on nuclear blackmail? None.

Yet most plans for nuclear energy envision spent fuel reprocessing and breeder reactors—which produce more plutonium than they use as fuel—as standard elements of the nuclear fuel cycle.

Our policy of nuclear exports make us and the other exporting nations—the "reliable suppliers" of our own potential destruction. By continuing that policy, we are squandering the brief moments left to prevent the further spread of nuclear arms.

At a minimum, we and the other nuclear suppliers must recognize that the world's interest in peace, security, and survival far outweighs the economic benefits of nuclear trade. Our first step is clear: we must agree to stop exporting technologies and materials that can be used to make nuclear bombs. We should set an example for the rest of the world.

The fourth, final, and absolutely essential step is to marshal our economic and political strength to the cause of peace and human progress around the world. Blustering rhetoric and saber-rattling are no substitute for a foreign policy aimed at diminishing the risks of a dangerous world. It will take active, courageous diplomacy—in the Middle East, in Central America, in southern Africa, and elsewhere, to help defuse the regional conflicts that can explode into broader confrontations. And it will take an affirmative American effort, together with the efforts of like-minded nations, to address the world's human needs—its need for food, its need for health, its need for hope. Left unattended, these unmet human needs are the seeds of war.

Twenty-four years ago, to this week, General Omar Bradley told another school convocation:

"If I am sometimes discouraged, it is not by the magnitude of the problem, but by our colossal indifference to it. I am unable to understand why—if we are willing to trust in reason as a restraint on the use of a readymade ready-to-fire bomb—we do not make greater, more diligent, and more imaginative use of reason and human intelligence in seeking an accord and compromise which will make it possible for mankind to control the atom and banish it as an instrument of war."

If today's convocations here at Cornell and elsewhere can begin to alter this "colossal indifference," then we will have moved toward a safer world. For if you are forced to think about nuclear war—to contemplate its likelihood and its consequences—then you, your family, your university, your community, your nation, will be compelled to act.

Today, a day to honor those who have given their lives for this country, it is appropriate to think about our personal visions of this nation. We each have these visions, our own ideal of what we want this country to stand for and accomplish. But I believe these personal visions share at least one element in common—that the purpose of America is peace, a secure peace.

With that purpose, we are here today. Without it, we will fail. And in such purpose, there is hope.●

DISMAL OUTLOOK FOR FUSION ENERGY

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, in November of last year Dr. Edwin Kintner resigned as the head of the magnetic fusion program at the Department of Energy. Dr. Kintner resigned in protest over budget cuts and unauthorized program alterations that he said was threatening the future of magnetic fusion energy research and development in this country.

In the next few weeks, we will see the President's proposed budget for fiscal year 1983 and I am sure we will find Dr. Kintner's worst fears and predictions realized. As a Member of this body who voted, less than 2 years ago, in favor of the Magnetic Fusion Engineering Act, I find the administration's proposals appalling. With no approval from this body, the administration is destroying legislation we saw as important and necessary. With no consultation, they are rejecting policies we felt were, and still are, vital to the energy future of this country.

I know this is not the last we will hear of this issue, nor should it be. Every Member of this body, whether they helped pass the historic Magnetic Fusion Engineering Act or not, should stand up and demand that the administration follow the laws we, and the people of this country, see fit to instate.

I would like to include an article, which I'm sure will be one of many to come, on this very critical issue.

U.S. BUDGET BATTLE CLOUDS OUTLOOK FOR FUSION ENERGY—FORMER HEAD OF FEDERAL PROGRAM CLAIMS 2 TO 4 YEARS ALREADY WASTED

(By Robert C. Cowen)

The U.S. program to develop hydrogen fusion power, which some hope will fuel America's future, appears to be in trouble.

That is the verdict of Edwin E. Kintner, who, until last month, was head of the magnetic fusion program of the Department of Energy (DOE). He resigned, he says, because of budget cutting and efforts by some federal officials to alter the program—a program mandated by a 1980 law.

Now, a year after Congress nearly unanimously passed the Magnetic Fusion Energy Act to accelerate that program, Dr. Kintner is taking every opportunity to tell the U.S. public that the strategy under which the program had been proceeding is in a shambles.

Speaking at a session of the recent annual meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science (AAAS), he said he concluded that the fusion program cannot be carried out in an intelligent, structured, and coordinated way in the present political and economic climate. Mike McCormack, former Democratic Congressman from Washington, chief architect of the Magnetic Fusion Energy Act, put it even more starkly. The Office of Management and Budget (OMB), he said, is refusing to comply with the law. He called this a "major tragedy" for the United States and the world.

An OMB official said he could not comment until the fiscal 1983 budget had been presented by the President. "We will defend ourselves at that time," he added.

The concern that has driven these two men to make such strong statements and, in Dr. Kintner's case, take the strong action of resigning after 42 years of Federal employment, is rooted in the longtime controversy within science circles on the feasibility of hydrogen fusion power.

Hydrogen fuel for the fusion reaction, which is the power source of the sun and stars, is virtually unlimited. Theoretically, then, fusion power could meet humanity's energy needs indefinitely. By 1980, and after several decades of research, fusion investigators around the world had concluded that it would probably be possible to get a fusion reaction running under control in the laboratory in this decade.

But to make a commercially practical power plant requires solving many tough engineering problems. It is not at all clear that this can be done, but investigators both in the U.S. and overseas have concluded that it is time to tackle the engineering problems likely to arise.

The DOE's fusion program has two principal directions. One is exploring laser fusion in which tiny capsules of hydrogen fuel are compressed by laser beams until they explode like miniature bombs. The other approach, which receives the major emphasis, the bulk of the funding, is magnetic fusion. In this, the hydrogen fuel—at temperatures of 50 to 100 million degrees—is confined by magnetic forces. This approach is the subject of the 1980 law.

Such a conclusion was not easily arrived at in the U.S. Some experts, especially within DOE and its predecessor agencies, long argued that fusion researchers should concentrate on thoroughly understanding fusion physics before working on power reactor engineering. Others argued that enough had been learned for the engineering research to proceed in parallel.

Gradually, through the '70s and after several major reviews of blue-ribbon study panels, a national consensus emerged on the need for the parallel approach. Mr. McCormack, and others envisioned a working demonstration fusion power plant by 2000. Others were more cautious. However, as Dr. Kintner explained at the AAAS session, there was wide agreement on the need to find out whether or not such a power plant were at all practical. If it wasn't, he said, this should be determined soon so that long-term energy planning would not include false hopes for fusion.

This consensus was embodied in the 1980 law and the resulting DOE fusion research strategy. Thus a program based on a broad, but hard-won, consensus and backed by congressmen and senators of both parties was put in place. It is the integrity of this strategy and the careful balance of its ingredients that Dr. Kintner says he believes in jeopardized.

The main line of research on the basic physics of fusion involves a device called a tokamak. The Tokamak Fusion Test Reactor (TFTR), being built at Princeton Plasma Physics Laboratory, is to be the main U.S. facility. Principal facilities for studying engineering problems were to include a Fusion Engineering Device (FED), a center for such research, and a facility to test various materials under radiation conditions typical of a fusion reactor. The latter facility is already being built at Hanford, Washington.

Such facilities and the balanced research strategy they represent were mandated by the 1980 law. The law required that the FED be in place by 1990 and that the magnetic fusion research budget be doubled in real terms over the next seven years. Experts such as Dr. Kintner, believed this to be a workable schedule. They expected to have the knowledge they need to decide on the feasibility of fusion by the 1990s.

Now Dr. Kintner says that schedule can no longer be met. He charges that the OMB, which once had suggested giving more money to the program, now wants to reorder priorities by giving more emphasis to the Princeton TFTR. It would cancel the Hanford facility, which Mr. McCormack called essential and the only one of its kind for the U.S. and its research partners in Europe and Japan.

DOE had rejected OMB's earlier offer of increased funding because this would have come out of other DOE projects. Also, DOE does not want to argue with OMB over the fusion budget and its priorities, since the energy department remains opposed to cutting other programs. This lack of support within DOE finally precipitated his resignation, Dr. Kintner says.

He explained at the AAAS session that, once a long-term strategy with such broad support is established, it must be sustained. He says two to four years have been lost already, and perhaps more in the long run.

Also, he noted that the U.S. has only about a third of the world fusion effort, although it has been a leader. No country will develop fusion alone, he said. Europe and Japan have realigned their efforts following the inauguration of the new U.S. strategy. But if the U.S. lets its leadership slip, Dr. Kintner warned, these research partners will be left somewhat at sea. This is what Mr. McCormack also had in mind when he called the threat to U.S. leadership "a tragedy" for the world as well as for the United States.●

REV. BOOKER T. CARTWRIGHT

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I want to share with my colleagues the deep sense of sadness I feel at the loss of a friend and leader in the cause of human rights. The Reverend Booker T. Cartwright, pastor of Newark's Bethel AME Church for the past 9 years, passed away recently, and left a tremendous void in the inspirational leadership of thousands of our city's residents.

Reverend Cartwright was truly a leader by example, and ever since he was ordained 45 years ago, he has devoted himself to helping improve the lives of his fellow men. This has meant countless hours of work in the community outside as well as inside the church. An active member of the NAACP and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, Reverend Cartwright also served as pastor of Mt. Zion AME Church in Plainfield, N.J., St. Luke AME Church in Newark, Macedonia AME Church in Camden, Mt. Zion AME Church in Trenton, Union Chapel AME Church in Newark, and Calvary AME Church in Glen Cove, N.Y.

I had the privilege of working with Reverend Cartwright for many years in projects to revitalize neighborhoods in our city of Newark. He was a man totally dedicated to advancing civil rights for all Americans. He was a man of justice and of peace.

I will miss him dearly and my condolences go out to his wife Gloria and his entire family.●

IN DEFENSE OF THE RIGHT TO LIFE

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, as we begin this second session of the 97th Congress it is my fondest hope that we, as lawmakers, will heed the many fine words spoken at the recent March for Life—the 9th since those two tragic Supreme Court decisions of January 22, 1973.

I was impressed by the dedicated tens of thousands of Americans who braved the cold to come to the Nation's Capitol to vote with their feet and hearts on behalf of the little unborn children who daily lose their lives.

I am enclosing a copy of the remarks given by the Most Reverend Thomas J. Welsh, Bishop of Arlington, which were given in commemoration of this most recent March for Life. The Bishop's statement appeared in the Arlington Catholic Herald of January 14, 1982.

CHANCERY OFFICE,
Arlington, Va., January 14, 1982.

MY DEAR CATHOLIC PEOPLE: Once again we approach the anniversary of that sad day in 1973 when the decision of the Supreme Court opened the floodgates of abortion in the United States.

Whenever the attempt is made to restore legal protection to the unborn, there is much talk about the victims of rape and incest, but the stark reality is that almost all of the millions of babies butchered in our country since 1973 have been the victims of selfishness and convenience. And, against the mounting medical documentation, and all common sense, fewer and fewer are the claims that these babies are not human.

We have made some progress this year in the attempt to secure full protection of the law for the unborn, but the process is slow and each day babies are being destroyed. We have a duty to support those men and women who are working at passing such laws and this is a principal reason for the March for Life. When we are tempted to be discouraged, and ask why we should brave the cold again this year, let us think of giving moral support to Senator Hatch, Congressman Hyde, Congressman Dornan and all the others.

The difficulties can be great blessings if they turn us more to prayer, penance and to God. He is the one who can turn the human heart from stone to compassion. He is the one who encourages us to seek to bring errant brothers and sisters back to Himself.

Please then, let us work and pray together.

Sincerely yours in our Lord,
Most Reverend THOMAS J. WELSH,
Bishop of Arlington.●

A DYNAMIC DUO

HON. GUY VANDER JAGT

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. VANDER JAGT. Mr. Speaker, for a good number of years it has been my pleasure and really my privilege to call the Rengo brothers—Bob and Ray—good friends. I have benefited from that friendship in untold ways. They are truly great men—contributing greatly to their home town of Kaleva, a unique and fine community in Manistee County, to the State of Michigan and to our Nation. They have a historic involvement in the Michigan Petroleum Association and it was only fitting that the association's magazine, Michigan Petroleum Marketer, recently featured the Rengo brothers in their fall, 1981, edition.

It is with great pride that I enclose that article entitled "It's the Home of Rengo Brothers, Inc., Village of Kaleva a Source of Leadership for MPA." Yes, Kaleva is a source of leadership but not just for MPA, but for Manistee County, the State of Michigan and our country. The article follows:

IT'S THE HOME OF RENGO BROTHERS, INC.—VILLAGE OF KALEVA A SOURCE OF LEADERSHIP FOR MPA

The village of Kaleva, a community of about 450 citizens, is located at the center of Michigan's Manistee County, about equidistant from the Lake Michigan shoreline and the swift-flowing Manistee River along the state's western reaches.

In truth, there is little that distinguishes Kaleva—apart from the fact that it was founded at the turn of the century by sturdy Finnish settlers whose hard work and proud heritage turned a harsh corner of the land into a pleasant rural community largely undistrubed by the hubbub of the world outside.

Kaleva also is the home of Rengo Brothers Inc., a jobbership that has been a source of valued leadership for the Michigan Petroleum Association practically from the moment the MPA was formed in 1934. Robert and Ray Rengo, principals of the firm today, are brothers who each served as presidents of the MPA, Bob having that assignment in 1961 and Ray in 1976. Their late father, Emil Rengo, was among the MPA's earliest members and directors, and served on the association's board until his death in 1949.

And while Bob's and Ray's terms as president are long since over, the two continue to be very active in MPA affairs. Bob is the long-time chairman of the association's insurance committee and has been an insurance trustee since the committee was established in 1953. Bob served as an alternate NOJC director and Ray presently is the alternate NOJC director for the MPA and will step up to NOJC director next year. As past presidents of the association, the Rengos are life-long board members and conscientiously attend every board meeting.

Like so many jobberships in the outstate area, the Rengo firm has gone through several transitions. It came into being in 1916 when Emil, who was then 23, opened a hardware store in Kaleva with a gasoline pump just outside the door. Selling gasoline seems to have been something of an after-thought for the young hardwareman . . . perhaps as an added convenience to his fellow residents.

Eight years later, Emil built the first drive in service station in rural Manistee County. Situated in Kaleva, that station was the forerunner of nearly three dozen that the Rengo firm would eventually own or serve. In 1932, Emil signed a franchise with White Star Refining and the Rengo Service Stations soon included 11 stations scattered strategically throughout Manistee County.

Although both sons "grew up" in their father's business (Ray recalls delivering fuel oil from a 400-gallon tank on the rear of a company pick-up when he was just 12 years old), Emil's tragic death in an automobile accident in 1949 hastened the brothers' involvement—especially Bob's.

A 1942 graduate of MSU, Bob Rengo, after being on the flight instruction staff at Purdue University, was a civilian airline captain for China National Aviation Corp. during World War II. He flew 161 missions over the "hump" from India to China and then throughout China from Shanghai after the war. (The comic strip "Terry and the Pirates" was based on the operations of China National Aviation which pioneered the famous "hump" route over some of the highest mountains in the world. It was the supply arm for the American Volunteer Group, better known as the Flying Tigers.) In 1946 he joined the family business in Kaleva and three years later, following his father's death, took over the helm of the firm. Ray graduated from MSU in 1950, served in U.S. Army during the Korean War and joined his brother in 1956.

By this time, Bob had disposed of other business ventures including an insurance agency and a plumbing, heating and appliance business—thus permitting "Rengo Brothers Inc." to concentrate fully on the gasoline and fuel oil business. They also switched to the Phillips 66 brand then.

During the next two years, the brothers built 12 stations, all dealer-operated and owned by Rengo Brothers. Eventually, the jobbership was supplying 32 service stations and had acquired about 2,000 fuel oil accounts. In 1978, they sold the gasoline and fuel oil business to Blarney Castle Oil Co. of nearby Bear Lake, but retain ownership of their station properties. Today, the company is a supplier of aviation fuel throughout Michigan.

Although they have disposed of a substantial portion of their business, the Rengos remain plenty busy. They are involved in land development and related real estate activities including ownership of various business sites in the 9-county area that the company served as a gasoline wholesaler.

With the discovery of oil near Kaleva, the Rengos have expanded their oil exploration activities and now have producing wells in a number of areas.

While the success of the Rengo firm must first be traced back to the industry of Emil and the natural growth of gasoline business, both Rengo brothers are quick to attribute a portion of their prosperity to the influence of the Michigan Petroleum Association.

Says Bob:

"Any success that we have had can be attributed in large part to our participation in the MPA. Our philosophy has always been that if we expect to grow within the industry, we have a responsibility to participate in association activities, and that's what we have attempted to do. And I know that it has been through those activities that we have gained the direction to develop and expand our own gasoline business."

Since 15 years separate their MPA presidencies (1961 for Bob vs. 1976 for Ray), vast changes had occurred. The extent of that change is illustrated by the events the two cite as high points in their respective presidential terms. It was during Bob's term that the late Joe Hadley, who had been on retainer from the MPA, became the association's full time executive director.

Fifteen years later, under Ray Rengo, the MPA adopted a computerized financial accounting system and began to place new emphasis on membership recruiting.

Ray proclaims that the MPA, henceforth, must develop even greater participation among its members, especially in the political process.

"With decontrol," Ray continues, "the major emphasis is coming back to the state level. For the survival of the MPA jobber, we have to get still more active in the state political process . . . selecting candidates who share similar philosophies with the MPA, particularly in the outstate area . . . supporting their candidacies . . . getting them elected . . . and remaining in touch with them after they are in office."

Involvement, within the MPA as well as in the political process, has been a watchword with Bob and Ray Rengo for many years. Ray served as county Republican chairman and Bob, as county finance co-chairman, has had a continuing hand in Republican party fund-raising efforts. An annual summer barbecue that the two host has become something of a social "event" locally and adds substantially to the party's coffers. The two Rengos are on a first-name basis with numerous county, state and federal political office-holders, having supported them from the first days of their respective candidacies.

As for the extent of their involvement individually, there isn't room to list everything, but here are some of the more significant activities that the two could recall immediately to mind:

Bo Rengo has been the mayor of Kaleva since 1949. He is finance co-chairman for the county Republicans. He is past president, treasurer and currently a member of the Manistee County Airport Authority. He is vice chairman of the county road commission. He serves as a director of Kaleva Medical Facility and Development Corp. He is treasurer of the China-National Aviation Corp. association, comprised of former members of that World War II transport air-ferrying group. (Although he no longer flies due to vision difficulties, Bob has logged about 8,000 hours flying time.) He is a former NOJC alternate and member of the NOJC fuels committee.

Ray Rengo is a charter member of the Kaleva Lions Club. He served eight years as president of the local school board, during which time he presided over the successful consolidation of two school districts to bring about one, financially healthy system.

He is currently treasurer and in his 13th year on the Manistee County Intermediate School Board. He was a charter member and has only recently retired after 14 years on the board of West Shore Hospital. During that time, he helped spearhead a $3 million, 100-bed new county hospital. Earlier, he was a board member of Memorial Hospital in nearby Onekama. He is past president of the 4-county Shrine club. He is a former president of the county Republican party.

The fact that both men were born and raised in Kaleva only partly explains their committment to their community. Bob and Ray Rengo recognize an obligation to their fellowman—in Kaleva and Manistee County as well as the Michigan Petroleum Association.

While Bob continues to reside in Kaleva, Ray lives now in Traverse City and makes the 45-minute commute back and forth between his home and the Rengo Brothers Inc. 3,000-sq.-ft. headquarters building in Kaleva.

The corporation is an equal partnership with Bob president and Ray treasurer. But the two serve interchangeably within that corporate structure. "Our philosophy," says Ray, "has always been that if we both didn't agree on something, we didn't do it. But, basically, we've both had the same goals . . . get the job done!"●

EIGHTH DISTRICT VIEW ON EL SALVADOR

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, the belief that public discussion of Government policy may correct errors of those who govern is fundamental to our concept of democracy. Experience has shown the wisdom of this belief in the conduct of foreign policy.

Those of us in the Congress who are deeply concerned about U.S. involvement in El Salvador have drawn tremendous support from the rank and file of our constituents who oppose that involvement. In the past year, the depth and thoughtfulness of citizen reaction to U.S. involvement in El Salvador has impressed me profoundly.

A recent editorial in the Circulating Pines, Circle Pines, Minn., exemplifies the quality of public debate occurring throughout my district on U.S. policy towards El Salvador. I would ask that this editorial be included in the RECORD.

THE U.S. AND OPPRESSION IN EL SALVADOR

We are hearing a lot these days about Russia's oppression of the Polish people but very little about United States policy in El Salvador which supports the junta which oppresses the people of El Salvador.

El Salvador is a small country with a population of five million. Its wealth, based on coffee plantations, could hardly be more unequally distributed. Less than two percent of the population owns more than half the land, receives more than half the national income, and owns the entire banking system. Meanwhile half the population remains unemployed, and half the children die before the age of five from malnutrition.

An unbroken chain of military governments has perpetuated these oppressive conditions since 1932. Through the sixties and seventies the people formed labor unions, peasant federations and progressive political parties. These organizations after feeling they had exhausted all peaceful means of bringing about change teamed up in the creation of unified revolutionary political front, the FDR. Although Mexico, France and a number of other governments recognize the FDR as a representative political force which must have a role in any future government in El Salvador the U.S. government persists in blocking discussions which could lead to a peaceful settlement.

THE REAGAN SCENARIO

The El Salvador scenario the Reagan administration is selling the public presents the junta as fending off reactionary right and a Cuban-aided extremist left. The truth is the people of El Salvador are fighting the oppressive ruling oligarchy that exploits them and the military junta that supports the oligarchy. It is not a Communist plot orchestrated from within another country. Even the CIA cannot come up with any evidence that Cuba is supplying arms to the opposition in El Salvador.

There are ominous signs that the U.S. is considering military action. Lt. General

Walter Nutting, the U.S. Commander in Latin America, has insisted that U.S. military action is a necessary response to the growing strength of the forces in El Salvador who oppose the U.S. backed junta. Secretary of State Haig has openly discussed the possibility of blockading Cuba and Nicaragua, and the Pentagon has created a special military command for the Caribbean presumably in preparation for a blockade or other more drastic measures.

CENTRAL AMERICA AN ECONOMIC APPENDAGE

The fact is the U.S. treats El Salvador and other countries in Central America as economic appendages, just as Russia treats Poland as a country it can exploit economically for its own benefit. It seems U.S. weapons in the hands of repressive governments are necessary to maintain a climate friendly to international corporations.

Do we want El Salvador to become another Vietnam? Do we want our young people to spill their blood defending a military junta in El Salvador that is responsible for the assassination of more than 26,000 Salvadorans in less than two years?

It would be wise to extend our sympathy for the oppressed people of Poland to the people of El Salvador. Repression is repression whether it is practiced by Russia or the U.S., and as U.S. citizens we can do more about the behavior of our government than we can the government of Russia.●

CASTRO'S SPIES ARE NO LONGER TEENAGERS

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, "nowhere does the KGB get better operational mileage from the DGI than in this country." This is the view of Mr. David Atlee Phillips, in assessing the Cuban foreign intelligence service, the DGI or General Dictorate of Intelligence. The DGI is, as he explains, little more than an extension of the Soviet KGB. In an article entitled "Castro's Spies Are No Longer Teenagers," Mr. Phillips explains how the Cuban intelligence service was taken over by the Soviets, how it is used by them and why it is so valuable to the KGB in its operations against the United States.

The author was chief of the Latin America Division of the CIA until his retirement in 1975. He served in Cuba twice during his intelligence career. He is the founder of, and former president of, the Association of Former Intelligence Officers, an association of former professional intelligence personnel.

Soviet intelligence activities against the interests of the United States are of vital concern to our Government. The American people and their lawmakers should be aware of these Soviet activities and the role the Cuban DGI plays. I recommend Mr. Phillips' article, which appeared in the Retired Officer, January 1982:

CASTRO'S SPIES ARE NO LONGER TEENAGERS

(By David Atlee Phillips)

Fidel Castro, soon after becoming Cuba's newest dictator in the early hours of the first day of 1959, dispatched fledgling spies abroad to provide intelligence support for the export of his revolution. Some of his agents were teenagers who had fought with Castro during his two years in the Sierra Maestre mountains. The raw intelligence operatives were ridiculed from Mexico City to Tokyo when they pretended to be diplomats. Castro's spies could be spotted easily at embassy receptions, with their long hair, unkempt beards, ill-fitting black suits and, invariably, hip bulges which scarcely concealed a Colt .45-caliber automatic pistol, favored weapon of the General Directorate of Intelligence (DGI).

The DGI was Cuban in its early period, but was nursed through growing pains by the Committee of State Security, the Soviet secret service known as the KGB. From the beginning the Russians molded the DGI into its own image. KGB instructors taught Cubans the tradecraft of clandestine operations before they were posted overseas. Soon the appearance of DGI agents changed—their hair was trimmed, cut of clothing improved and ostentatious handguns were replaced with more discreet sidearms.

RESISTS SOVIET CONTROL

While Castro welcomed Soviet tutelage for the DGI, he resisted KGB schemes to control his intelligence service. His trusted DGI chief, Manuel Pineiro, had studied at Columbia University in New York, was married to an American and suspected Russian motives. Pineiro kept an eye on the KGB colonel who worked in an adjacent office. Other Soviet officers occupied advisory positions in the DGI and Pineiro watched them, too, reporting to his "maximum chief," Fidel Castro.

The tricks of the espionage trade taught by KGB officers to DGI agents were tested in the field when Castro attempted to export his revolution, often violently, to most of the countries of Latin America and the Caribbean. The Kremlin did not approve; the Politburo considered the adventures foolhardy and, worse, they didn't conform to the party line. The Soviets discouraged Castro's revolutionary antics, suggesting that he subvert his enemies quietly, Russian-style.

When Fidel Castro spurned Soviet political guidance the DGI became a chip in a game of power poker between the KGB on one side and, on the other, Castro and Pineiro.

By late 1961 Soviet bids to win control of the DGI became increasingly blatant. Some Cuban agents sent to Moscow for training were recruited by the KGB; others refused Russian blandishments, and reported the pitch to Pineiro. Fidel Castro tolerated the intrigue for over a year before he called the Soviet bluff. In a March 1962, television harangue—three hours on camera, shorter than most of his speeches—Castro castigated the Soviets for maneuvering to steal his revolution and suborn his secret service.

The contest for power in Cuba continued for six years. Then, in early 1968, Castro again challenged the Russians by jailing 34 pro Moscow Cuban officials.

Then the Russians played the oil card.

Petroleum shipments from the Black Sea to Cuban ports dwindled to a trickle and, in some cases, dried up completely. "The oil refineries are shut down for repairs," was the official Russian explanation. The Cuban economy sagged disastrously. Castro wanted desperately to call the Soviet hand. Once he ordered a census of Cuban oxen in the vain hope that the sugar harvest could be reaped without Russian fuel. The economy neared collapse.

FIDEL ACQUIESCES

Castro threw in his hand in the aftermath of the Prague Spring of 1968, when the Czech uprising was crushed by Soviet tanks. Except in Chile, leaders of every Communist Party in Latin America abandoned the party line to denounce the Soviets. Cubans expected Castro to join the chorus of condemnation in a television speech. The Russian ambassador met Castro privately. Perhaps the subject of discussion was oil. Whatever was said, Fidel Castro's speech, brief and blunt, stunned Cubans—he praised the Russian invasion of Czechoslovakia!

The Soviets had won the winner-take-all game. Cuba became a Russian stooge in international affairs, after Castro agreed not to criticize Soviet policy and to accept 5,000 Soviet specialists to run the Cuban economy. In the intelligence arena, the DGI became a KGB surrogate. Manuel Pineiro was demoted; the new DGI chief reported directly to the KGB; and Cuban spies around the world received new orders from headquarters. In Paris, the DGI chief summoned his staff and announced, "We are closer to the Soviets now." Asked to explain, he read aloud from the message from Havana: "We are working for our associates, and will be taking on some of their jobs."

One job the Cubans undertook for the KGB in 1971 in England was a rescue mission. The British government, exasperated by proliferating Soviet espionage activity, expelled 107 Russian diplomats. Without case officers to steer them, KGB networks foundered. But, a DGI defector in London later revealed, Cuban agents stepped in to handhold Soviet spies and keep espionage operations afloat until the KGB was able to replenish its staff with fresh diplomats.

The Soviets, through the DGI and, to a lesser extent, their military intelligence service, the Chief Directorate of the Soviet General Staff (GRU), used Cuban agents to their advantage during the 1970s. Castro's spies were especially useful in Africa and the Middle East. With the DGI pursuing Soviet ends, KGB advisors no longer discouraged violence in Cuban adventurism. KGB personnel and financing helped transform the island of Cuba into a vast academy for guerrillas and terrorists from more than 50 countries.

A lesson in Soviet endorsement of violence and Cuban promotion of it, is found in the principal textbook provided to students in secret schools in Cuba, a book published after the Russians were in charge. "Terrorism," instructs the Mini Manual of the Urban Guerrilla, "is an action that the urban guerrilla must execute with the greatest coldbloodedness, calmness and decision." Students learn that assassination requires only a single guerrilla. "In many cases," the manual reads, "the execution can be carried out by one sniper . . . operating in absolute secrecy and in cold blood."

One Cuban training camp graduate became a celebrated assassin and notorious terrorist. Ilich Ramirez Sanchez, a Venezuelan usually known as "Carlos" and sometimes called "the Jackal," headed the squad which kidnapped 12 OPEC oil ministers in Vienna in 1975. Three persons were killed, with Carlos himself pumping five bullets into one victim. In Paris, the same year, Carlos perpetrated several bloodbaths, including one when—"with the greatest cold-bloodedness"—he dropped an M-26 grenade from a nightclub balcony into the crowd below, wounding 30 people, two of them mortally. An informant led three French detectives to an apartment where Carlos was hiding. Although the police had the advantage of surprise, Carlos escaped after shooting and killing the informant and two of the policemen, and wounding the third.

The shootout prompted the French Interior Ministry to issue a statement "confirming the close link between terrorist networks and the espionage services of certain states." The ambiguity was deference to one state, the Soviet Union, which the French did not want to antagonize. But the French did not hesitate to name Cuba, and they expelled three DGI agents for conspiring to arrange Carlos' escape.

The Cuban connection with Soviet intelligence programs is not confined to DGI covert political gambits or GRU military field operations. As the DGI has matured, its agents have become adept in the basic espionage task of gathering information. Cubans make good spies. They are usually clever, often personable, The Spanish-speaking operatives communicate effectively in Latin America, black Cubans blend into African situations and blond DGI agents are not conspicuous in Europe.

But nowhere does the KGB get better operational mileage from the DGI than in this country.

SPYING ON THE UNITED STATES

The U.S. is described in KGB training lectures as "the main enemy." There are about 1,000 Soviet intelligence people in the U.S., 400 of them undercover at the United Nations Mission in New York. This army of spies makes the principal charge against American institutions, but skirmishes are launched from the flanks. In Mexico City, for instance, the large complement of KGB personel in the Soviet Embassy is not there to pilfer Mexican secrets (there aren't many), but to use Mexico as a base of operations against American targets. Similarly, DGI headquarters in Havana is a KGB command post for sorties into the U.S.

Official cover for the DGI in the U.S. is limited, due to the absence of diplomatic relations between the two countries. But 20 Cuban agents work out of the Cuban Interest Section in the Czech Embassy in Washington, and 80 in the United Nations Mission in New York.

When diplomatic billets are scarce secret services rely on "illegals," or deep-cover agents. The KGB has spent large sums and years of preparation in order to insinuate a single deep-cover spy into U.S. society, usually after a stopover in an English-speaking country to polish language. The time and money is considered well spent, as spies need a cover, or legend, to explain their presence in the U.S.

The DGI has no such problem—it dispatches agents into the U.S. quickly and cheaply.

"The only thing the KGB has to do," explains Alfonso Tarabochio, a former senate counter-intelligence investigator, "is just throw the Cuban agents among the Cuban communnity to pretend they escaped by boat or they jumped the fence in Guantanamo." Once DGI spies mingle with Cuban exiles in a U.S. city, they have only to spout a few anti-Castro slogans to be accepted. "So they don't have to build legends like a Soviet or East German would have to do, or come to the U.S. either from Australia or South Africa, like some of the Soviets have. They can come directly here, by boat."

Once in the U.S., the KGB-DGI spies operate without much difficulty. The FBI is charged with thwarting Cuban espionage, but one Bureau agent admits, "We might as well give the Cubans a license to spy. We have our hands full watching Russians; there's simply not enough manpower or money to monitor Cuban activities adequately."

Yet, the FBI has foiled DGI operations which prove that cuban intelligence poses a serious security threat. Some Cuban operations have been ominous. For example, a DGI officer was expelled after he attempted to purloin the floor plans of then-President Nixon's Florida residence. Other DGI capers have been in the James Bond tradition, as when the Cubans dangled a beautiful South African blonde, "Jennifer," as sexual bait for big fish in Washington, hooking at least one senior Department of State officer.

VENCEREMOS BRIGADES

Psychological warfare experts consider the DGI-sponsored Venceremos (We Will Win) Brigades one of the most successful covert political operations in modern history. Some 2,500 Americans, in 10 contingents, visited Cuba between 1969 and 1977. The ostensible purpose was to cut Cuban sugar cane. In fact, the Americans were encouraged to destroy their own society, U.S. Weathermen—members of the underground radical group which boasted of bombing the U.S. Capitol—met Vietnamese and Viet Cong delegations in Havana. Within weeks of their return they fanned the flames of the Chicago riots.

A more recent DGI propaganda coup was the successful campaign to create doubt about the authenticity of a Department of State White Paper on El Salvador—a media event orchestrated from his European exile by renegade CIA agent Philip Agee. Agee has played the role of a Cuban agent of influence for almost a decade. He pounded pro-Cuban drums before elections in Jamaica, has been the star attraction at a Communist Youth Festival in Havana and today continues his identification of American intelligence agents aboard.

In addition to DGI support, the Soviet Union can now expect military field assistance from GRU-trained Cuban intelligence officers among the thousands of troops in Africa and the Middle East. Closer to home, Cuban officers are working with the Nicaraguan government to accomplish its goal of a 50,000-man army in 1982.

"Our priorities have had to change," comments a long-time Defense Intelligence Agency officer.

A half-dozen CIA and FBI veterans were recently asked to respond in one word to the question, "How good is the DGI now?"

"Good."

"Better."

"Professional."

"Improved."

"Aggressive."

And, disregarding the one-word-answer injunction, "Damned good."

Castro's secret service has come of age, and his spies are no longer teenagers. If licenses are to be issued, they should be to the FBI at home and the CIA aboard—in the form of authority and funds to confront the Soviet Union on yet another front.●

TAX-EXEMPTIONS FOR SEGREGATED PRIVATE SCHOOLS

HON. ANTHONY TOBY MOFFETT

OF CONNECTICUT

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. MOFFETT. Mr. Speaker, the administration was busy over the congressional recess. While we were out of town, President Reagan decided that the Internal Revenue Service ruling which prohibits segregated private schools from taking a tax exemption was no longer to be the law of the land. After a flurry of furious condemnation of this announcement, the President retreated from his stand in favor of segregated school tax exemptions by forwarding legislation to the Congress to codify the original IRS ruling. The Secretary of the Treasury, we are told, will not act on any applications for tax exemptions filed in response to the new IRS policy (or lack thereof) until we have acted on the President's proposed legislation. Now we are in a state of limbo as to exactly what policy the administration is espousing.

Many legal scholars have concluded that the IRS has indeed the authority to continue prohibiting tax exemptions for segregated private schools. New legislation is, therefore, moot. I concur wholeheartedly that legislation should not be necessary. However, in the event that the President cannot be dissuaded from his pursuit of codification legislation, I am joining with my colleague from New York, Hon. TOM DOWNEY, in introducing a simple sense of the Congress resolution expressing our conviction that the original IRS ruling is valid, reflects and has always reflected the will of Congress and the courts, and that the President's action to countermand that authority is null and void.

We do not need to codify or otherwise legislate a policy which has been historically the law of the land. I will be exerting every effort to deflect the President's proposal and to persuade him to embrace the historical policy against tax exemptions for segregated private schools. In the interim, I feel it very important for Congress to go on record in opposition to the President's actions and send a clear message to the Nation that we do not, will not, and have never allowed tax exemptions for segregated schools. I hope you will join with Mr. DOWNEY and me in this endeavor.●

THE NEED TO MAKE TAX CHANGES FOR RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT PERMANENT

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, increased R. & D. is the key to America's future—it is the best way that we can increase our productivity, compete with foreign products, and create new, better-paid jobs. The 1981 Tax Act made some changes designed to encourage more U.S.-based research and experimentation. But these provisions are temporary, and thus discourage industry, small businessmen, and universities from undertaking long-range programs of basic research. We need to get rid of the uncertainty caused by the temporariness of the present law.

In the 1981 Economic Recovery Tax Act, the Congress provided: First, for a 25-percent tax credit for certain research and experimental expenditures, but only to the extent that current-year expenditures exceed the average amount of such expenditures during a base period. This provision expires December 31, 1985.

Second, that for 2 taxable years after the date of enactment, taxpayers must allocate or apportion all research and experimental expenditures paid or incurred in activities conducted in the United States to U.S. source income; this provision is designed to encourage R. & D. in the United States, rather than abroad.

To eliminate the uncertainty caused by the termination dates in these two provisions, I am today introducing legislation to delete the termination provisions in the area of research and development.

For California and for the Nation, there can be no more important task than restoring our commitment to increased levels of R. & D. Our levels of civilian research and development expenditures have fallen way behind those of Japan and West Germany, and as a result we are losing world market share and jobs to foreign competition.

The Tax Act of 1981 was a disaster in many ways. One of its major shortfalls is that it did so little to concentrate the Nation's resources on the industries of the future. Even those R. & D. tax changes which were made were temporary. Correction of these oversights should be a priority in any new tax bills considered by the Congress.●

CONGRESS 1981 SESSION

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, December 31, 1981, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

CONGRESS 1981 SESSION

The first session of the 97th Congress, which ended on December 16, 1981, marked a fundamental change in the direction of public policy in the United States. A half-century of rapid growth in social programs was brought to a halt. Acting on the belief that it was responding to the mandate of the 1980 election, Congress took bold steps toward reducing the scope and power of the federal government in the domestic affairs of the nation.

Domestic programs were cut back in size, and many were consolidated into block grants for the states. The growth of spending for them was slowed, but not stopped. The President's new program of federalism—consisting of budget cuts, block grants, and a turnback of tax sources to the states—was partly enacted. Mr. Reagan's program of economic recovery dominated the session and, in the end, he succeeded in getting virtually all that he wanted:

$35 billion in savings in some 250 programs;

Repeal of public service jobs and of assistance for college education under social security;

Cutbacks in assistance for workers who lose jobs because of imports, in programs to feed school children, and in "impact" aid for schools attended by children of federal employees;

A slowing of the rapid rate of expansion in food stamps, medicaid, and medicare; and

Tax cuts, totaling $750 billion over five years, for individuals and businesses based on "supply-side" economics, which holds that lower tax rates create incentives for investment which, in turn, increase economic growth and tax receipts and, in the long run, provide the opportunity to bring the budget into balance.

Congress also approved the largest peacetime increase in defense spending in history (including money for the MX missile and the B-1 bomber), a four-year farm bill, the first trillion-dollar debt in the nation's history, and the nomination of the first woman, Mrs. O'Connor, to serve as a Justice of the United States Supreme Court.

The first session of the 97th Congress was the President's from beginning to end. He controlled it almost completely, winning one major victory after another. The major loss for Mr. Reagan was Congress' refusal even to consider his proposal to overhaul the social security system. In the process of compiling his impressive legislative track record, the President compelled Congress to bend and twist its institutional rules and procedures. To expedite hundreds of cuts in spending and changes in programs, most legislation was folded into a few omnibus bills, thus bypassing the normal process of authorization and appropriation. Delays in appropriations, necessitated by the complexity of the issues presented by the budget, had the entire government operating on an emergency, catch-all "continuing resolution" for several months. Mr. Reagan was expected to do well in the Republican Senate, but he also took command of the nominally Democratic House of Representatives by re-fashioning the old coalition of Republicans and conservative Democrats. Although the Democrats were able to prevail narrowly on certain measures, they could not muster the two-thirds majority to override a veto.

Because of its preoccupation with the budget, Congress put off action on social issues such as abortion, school prayer, and busing. It also deferred action on social security reform, revision of the Clean Air Act, and voting rights for minorities. Although Congress passed the first foreign aid appropriation in years (with an increase in funding) and gave the President its approval of his proposal to sell sophisticated radar aircraft (AWACS) to Saudi Arabia, issues of foreign policy were overshadowed by issues of domestic policy the entire session in spite of increasing tension and turmoil in many parts of the world.

Although I approve of the change in the direction of public policy toward curtailment of rapid growth in government on the domestic side, I am nonetheless concerned about a number of Congress' specific actions. From my point of view, the increase in defense spending is too large and the tax cut too great. As a result, Mr. Reagan's budget is far too expansionary and deficit-ridden. I believe that the reductions in programs of health and education are also too big, and I disapprove of the President's increase in funding for foreign aid. Moreover, the handling of all major budget and tax proposals in omnibus packages represents an abuse of the congressional budget process. Serious mistakes can be made when legislative safeguards are swept aside for the sake of quick consideration. Finally, I do not support the general "tilt" of the budget and tax reductions because they favor the rich at the expense of the middle class and the poor.

There is now a high degree of concern among legislators in Congress about the economic, social, and political consequences of the trends which have been set in motion this year. As the first session of the 97th Congress drew to a close, the returns on the President's program were not all in, but the results which were known were mixed at best. My own view is that the concern will increase as the events of the next year are played out.●

THE ANNIVERSARY OF UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE

HON. HAROLD C. HOLLENBECK

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. HOLLENBECK. Mr. Speaker, 64 years ago the proud and fiercely independent Ukrainian people tried to win freedom when a group of patriots proclaimed the sovereignty of their native land from Russia. I would like to take this opportunity to join with my colleagues in commemorating this important event, which should remind us that Ukrainians now, as in the past, are determined to guide their own destiny in an independent state.

The Ukrainian people's unique cultural, historical, and intellectual traditions represent a source of real and enduring national pride that can never be subdued by the forced imposition of a foreign state's ideology. We must never be allowed to forget the relentless efforts of the Ukrainian people in their drive for a renewed independence.

As we express our continuing concern for the people of Ukraine, it is also important to pay tribute to Americans of Ukrainian birth and heritage who have made significant political, economic, and cultural contributions to the well-being of this country. They have distinguished themselves by constructive citizenship, by their dedication to America, and by their unyielding devotion to the cause of liberty.

In remembering this anniversary of Ukrainian independence, we in the United States are expressing our support for the aspirations of the Ukrainian people and our fervent hope that the Ukraine will again recover its freedom. I only wish for that day in the near future when, instead of marking the anniversary of an independence since lost, we will celebrate a renewed independence of modern times.●

HON. BOB LIVINGSTON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, the National Health Planning and Resource Development Act of 1974 and its subsequent amendments have been responsible for the creation of a nationwide system of health system or planning agencies (HSA's). These regulatory bodies number over 200 and are scattered throughout the 50 States. As many Members know, the present administration has recommended the phaseout of the entire health planning network. In addition, Representative SHELBY from Alabama has introduced legislation, H.R. 4554, to repeal the Federal Government's health planning functions by September 30, 1982. Over the years many medical associations and societies have expressed their disfavor about the National Health Planning System.

However, until recently the 17,000 members of the American Society of Internal Medicine have never called for repeal or cessation of funding for the health planning program.

In light of their past views, I think it is significant that the society has now come out in favor of repeal of the national health planning law—Public Law 93-641. For this reason, I have submitted for the Members' attention, a recently completed report by the society on the ineffectiveness of the health planning system.

The report follows:

A SUMMARY OF THE DATA ON THE IMPACT OF HEALTH PLANNING ON THE COST OF AND ACCESS TO HEALTH CARE

INTRODUCTION

The Health Planning and Resource Development Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-641) and its subsequent amendments, as well as the state Certificate-of-Need (CON) programs mandated by the act, resulted from a desire to bring order, economy and efficiency to the allocation of health care resources in the United States. The specific problems which the legislation attempts to address are the rise in the cost of medical care, the wasteful presence of excess capacity within the system, and the related problems of access and efficient resource allocation.

Health planning and CON have been the subject of many studies, several of which present persuasive evidence that mandatory health planning not only falls far short of its goals, but is in many cases actually counter-productive to its own stated objectives.

COST

1. Cost containment

The primary issue which must be addressed when evaluating Federal health planning is the question of the effects of health planning, and CON in particular, on controlling costs in health care.

One of the more comprehensive studies of CON was published by David S. Salkever of Johns Hopkins University and Thomas N. Bice of Washington University, St. Louis, under contract with DHHS in 1976. Their report, "Impact of State Certificate-of-Need Laws on Health Care Costs and Utilization," concluded:

"The results of this analysis indicate that Certificate of Need (CON) controls reduced expansion in beds, but increased expansion in plant assets per bed, and had no discernible negative effect on total investment (change in total plant assets). In other words, CON controls altered the composition of investment but not its magnitude, discouraging new beds, but encouraging investment in new equipment and services.

"In summary, our analysis points to the (perhaps) surprising conclusion that CON controls have contributed to cost inflation; thus, they have tended to produce the very result which they were designed to prevent. This conclusion must, of course, be treated cautiously due to the limitations of the analyses on which it was based . . . At a minimum, our findings signal the need for a much more thorough and detailed study of the effectiveness of CON regulation as a cost control device. The presumption of its effectiveness is clearly not warranted by the available evidence."[1]

More recently, a study conducted by Policy Analysis, Inc. (PAI) under contract to the Health Resources Administration, also raised questions about CON's cost-effectiveness.

The summary below is quoted from the Bureau of Health Planning's "Program Information Letter" which accompanied the study.

"PAI attempted to test a number of general hypotheses regarding interstate CON program variation and the programs' effects on capital accumulation, the rate of cost inflation, geographic distribution and the structure of the hospital industry.

"The study found some differences among States with regard to holding applicants to stated or intended criteria. These were associated with program strength. However, it found no evidence that CON programs have significantly reduced the rate of growth of hospital capital stock, nor did 'strong' programs succeed in holding hospital cost increases below those of states with no or 'weak' CON programs. Distribution-oriented programs—mostly located outside the Northeast—do seem to give preference to underserved areas, as measured by mean county income. Based upon these findings. PAI recommends that the Federal Government should limit its reliance on CON as a cost containment mechanism because of its lack of impact."[2]

In November 1978, the Department of Health and Human Services, as part of its Health Planning Bibliography series, published a study entitled "Certificate of Need Programs: A Review, Analysis, and Annotated Bibliography of the Research Literature."

In summarizing its findings, the study concluded that:

"The pessimism of this discussion is a reflection of the pessimism in the literature on regualtion in general and CON in particular. The most enthusiastic program advocates in the literature argue that CON is effective on theoretical grounds (stemming from the public interest theory of regulation). The reality of the evidence, however, only suggests that in some settings and under some circumstances, the program may yield results consistent with its goals. While the final verdict is not yet in, the preliminary hearing has not been encouraging."[3]

The same study pointed out that:

"Prices may rise under CON both because higher prices will be needed to finance the subsidies and ineffeciencies created by regulation and because supply restrictions may cause a disequilibrium between supply and demand."[4]

2. Compliance costs

The cost and effort of complying with government regulations has long been a burden on the health care industry. Below is a review of studies which examine the costs to hospitals in various States of compliance with Government regulations in general, a sizable portion of which is specifically attributable to health planning and CON laws.

A. Hospital Association of New York State Cost Study—1978: 25 percent of hospital costs attributable to meeting Goverment regulation; annual cost of regulation exceeds $1.1 billion per year; time required for reporting, 115 million person-hours, is equivalent to 56,000 full-time hospital employees; 56,000 employees could staff 75 hospitals, each with an average of 250 beds; regulatory matters occupy 24 percent of all person-hours; completion of forms and reports costs New York hospitals $128 million annually; and estimated cost $40.00 per hospital/per day.

B. California Hospital Medical center review—1976: Direct compliance costs estimated to be $70 per admission ($10.75 per patient day). Estimates did not take into account engineering, maintenance, and remodeling costs required by regulatory action.

C. Health Controls Out of Control—Warnings to the Nation from Massachusetts—Regulatory Actions—1977, David Kinzer: Direct Compliance costs estimated to be 3½ to 4 percent of operating expenses. No estimates of indirect costs.

See footnotes at end of article.

D. Michigan Hospital Association—Hospital Costs Attributable to Government Regulation, December 1977: Direct costs estimated to represent 1.5 percent of the annual operating budgets of the surveyed hospitals, which equals $3 per hospital/per day.

E. South Carolina Hospital Association—Hospital Costs and Changes in the Financial Position Attributable to Selected Government Regulations, Arthur Young & Co., March, 1978: Six hospitals of varying sizes, bed capacities, occupancy rates, and other representative characteristics were surveyed. The following costs for fiscal year 1976 were attributable to four areas of Government regulation:

	Utilization review and PSRO	Personnel management	Capital planning/ certificate of need	Reimbursement mechanisms	Total
Hospital A	$16,571 or 0.83/patient-day	$21,542 or 1.06/patient-day	$163	$13,536; 2,364 person-hours expended	$51,812
Hospital B	$17,547 or 0.47/patient-day	$21,204 or 0.57/patient-day		$3,738; 643 person-hours expended	42,489
Hospital C	NA	$53,462 or 1.38/patient-day	13,326	$11,134; 2,645 person-hours expended	77,922
Hospital D	$45,795 or 0.59/patient-day	$60,539 or 0.78/patient-day	22,610	$43,885; 8,067/person-hours expended	172,829
Hospital E	$12,741 or 0.17/patient-day	$109,216 or 1.42/patient-day	2,377	$14,412; 3,842 person-hours expended	138,746
Hospital F	$47,617 or 0.30/patient-day	$117,543 or 0.73/patient-day	17,265	$42,669; 7,523 person-hours expended	224,594

3. Indirect costs

Thus far, it has been suggested that health planning and CON laws, which hold cost containment in health care as a primary objective, have the following effects:

They cost the Federal and State governments hundreds of million of dollars to administer.

Hospitals and health care providers spend "at least as much as the agencies"[5] in complying with the regulations.

Their actual effectiveness in holding down health care costs is, at best, highly questionable.

In addition, many studies have pointed out that health planning also produced "indirect costs." These include:

A. Travel costs: The New England Journal of Medicine has pointed out that efforts to reduce duplication of facilities through Government regulation can lead to high travel costs and costly delays in treatment:

"If fewer facilities are to serve the same patient population, some patients will inevitably have to seek treatment further from home. Additional travel costs will be incurred, and the quality of care that some patients receive will be reduced.

"In the case of the CAT scanner, some outpatients would have to travel further than they did before, and some inpatients would require transportation to and from the facility. For patients with trauma and patients with severe illness, increased travel time reduces the quality of care. A similar case can be made for radiation-therapy units: Because patients with cancer must return many times for treatment, travel time is of economic importance. Reducing the number of general-hospital beds not only increases travel distance but can also lead to longer delays in treatment, which impose real costs."[6]

B. Legal costs: Law suits brought by communities and providers dissatisfied with the actions of their local HSAs have imposed a considerable cost on all parties involved.[7]

C. Costs of delay: While it is clear that careful study is necessary before constructing or adding to a hospital or other health care facility, the CON bureaucracy causes unnecessary delays of months and often years, and then usually ends up granting approval, sometimes with minor modifications.[8] When this occurs, the final cost of construction (or cost of purchase, in the case of equipment) is often considerably higher than it would have been without CON-imposed delays—as much as 30 to 40 percent higher.[9]

All in all, there is a great deal of evidence to support the conclusion that health planning costs a great deal, directly and indirectly, and yet relying on state certificate-of-need programs and federally mandated planning programs to control hospital costs has yielded, and will continue to yield, disappointing results.[10]

ACCESS

1. Effects of health planning on access

The second major aim of Public Law 93-641 is "equal to quality health care." Whether this is actually being realized under health planning is in as much doubt as the cost-effectiveness of health planning.

An article in The New England Journal of Medicine pointed out several of the problems health planning causes with regard to access:

"Of special concern is the distinct possibility that large urban medical centers are more likely to fare well under any regulation scheme than are smaller, less sophisticated hospitals located in rural, suburban, and ghetto areas.

"To the extent that areas of low population density bear the brunt of the regulations, offsetting costs will be higher. In addition, if patients are forced from low-cost hospitals into relatively expensive urban medical centers, the net result may be to increase costs. Our calculations assumed that consolidations would be encouraged only if the unit cost of care could be reduced; unfortunately, there is no guarantee that the processes will work this way.

Finally, if minority groups in low-income areas find that their hospitals cannot survive the regulatory contests, as appears to have been the case in New York, we may end up harming precisely those groups that many advocates of hospital regulation hope to help."[11]

2. Access as a priority in health planning

Aside from the access problems inherent in health planning efforts is the simple fact that health planning and CON have evolved into cost-containment mechanisms (of extremely dubious worth, as demonstrated earlier) with little regard to access. The American Journal of Public Health clearly outlines this shift in priority:

"During the 1960's and early 1970's, the primary goal of national health policy was to improve access to health care, especially for the poor. The Medicare and Medicaid programs, the Office fo Economic Opportunity (OEO, and later HEW) neighborhood health centers, the Federal support for health professions education and many other specific Federal programs had that as their primary aim. Even the 1974 Health Planning Act (Public Law 93-641)—often considered to be primarily a cost-containment program—listed primary care services for underserved populations as the first of a number of national priorities.

"The thrust of national health policy has changed, as any casual observer of the health care scene knows. The emphasis is now on cost containment, almost to the exclusion of other considerations."[12]

SUMMARY

In summary, it appears that health planning and CON are of dubious worth on several counts. They are cost-containment tools which cost a great deal, directly and indirectly, and ultimately save little. As a mechanism to improve access they have done little and may have actually had a negative impact in many cases.

In view of the apparent shortcomings of Federal health planning, the American Society of Internal Medicine believes that repeal of Public Law 93-641, or at the very least elimination of funding, would be a desirable goal.

Health planning is most effective when allowed to respond to local conditions and specific needs. The combination of local political forces and the market forces in the economy are the most effective agents of health care planning. There are several studies which substantiate this view, three of which are summarized below:

1. John W. Carr seeks to determine whether central planning and control or market methods of allocation result in a more efficient distribution of hospital resources. He concludes that the planning method has the potential of being more efficient in a technical sense. However, for many reasons, the planning method may not in actual practice be more efficient, and the market mechanism might be more practical. The market mechanism also has the advantage of automatic operation.[13]

2. In his paper, H. E. Frech discusses the choice between regulation and allowing the market to operate. Frech's recommendations include abolishing or modifying State CON programs. The paper concludes that the current form of regulation of the U.S. medical care system is partly responsible for its poor performance. Regulation of this industry is inherently difficult because of the complexity of its output and because the influence of providers over regulation is quite strong. Frech believes that regulatory reform to improve incentives, make the system more responsive to consumer preferences, and reduce the anti-competitive effects of existing regulation could be very beneficial.[14]

3. Finally, Clark Havighurst argues that private sector efforts to contain health care costs are likely to be more effective than Government-sponsored controls. Therefore, Government efforts should be confined, at least initially, to untying and strengthening the private sector's hands.[15]

CONGRESSIONAL LIVING EXPENSE TAX DEDUCTIONS

HON. MARILYN LLOYD BOUQUARD

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mrs. BOUQUARD. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing along with Ms. FIEDLER, Mr. DUNCAN, Mr. VOLKMER, Mr. HANSEN of Utah, Mr. EVANS of Iowa, Mr. RATCHFORD, Mr. DYSON, Mr. BOWEN, Mr. GREGG, Mr. ROBERTS of South Dakota and Mrs. SCHROEDER, legislation that would overturn the recently enacted congressional living expense tax deductions.

I firmly believe that Members of Congress should not receive any tax benefits, or treatment that varies with what other taxpayers must accept. With this in mind, I supported the elimination of the automatic $3,000 living expense deduction that was available only to Members of Congress. I expected, as did the vast majority of our colleagues that the elimination of this privileged deduction would result in Members receiving the very same treatment as other taxpayers on the matter of living expenses. That is, we would be able to claim those expenses which we could document and which the Internal Revenue Service would accept as legitimate costs incurred as a result of our employment.

Unfortunately, the other body, in its wisdom, felt it necessary to call upon the Secretary of the Treasury to issue regulations defining what level of deductions would be appropriate. While this clearly runs counter to the intent of those of us who sought only to end the favorable treatment Members of Congress had enjoyed, we accepted the argument that the Secretary of the Treasury, because he has responsibility for the Government's revenue, might be expected to be parsimonious in his treatment of Members' tax benefits. We were, needless to say, disappointed in this hope.

Under the regulations issued by Secretary of the Treasury Regan, Members of this body will be able to claim $19,650 in tax deductions for last year instead of the $3,000 that was formerly permitted. While the actual impact of this deduction will vary from Member to Member, according to the publication Congressional Quarterly, this would translate into a salary increase of approximately $7,000 for a married Member with two children who lives primarily on the congressional salary.

This Congress has repeatedly turned down efforts to increase congressional pay, most recently in connection with the conference report on the second continuing resolution, H.J. 357. With this record, we can hardly wonder why the public has reacted so vigorously to a transparent effort to raise income without increasing salary.

Above all, we should not resort to devious parliamentary tactics to fatten our salaries. At this point, the most reasonable step would be to return to the $3,000 ceiling on living expense deductions for 1981, and to make any changes that are appropriate for 1982 and beyond that during the coming year. This would offer our constituents the opportunity to judge the votes of their Members without the confusion which necessarily results from adding riders of this sort onto crucial legislation.

I have no objection to providing in law that a Member of Congress receive the same benefits and treatment from the IRS as do all other taxpayers. But, we cannot condone either the extraordinary generosity of the Treasury in this matter, or the dubious tactics that prevented the issue from being clearly defined and debated.

I hope that we will enact this legislation.●

LAW ENFORCEMENT OFFICERS' SALARY ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1982

HON. HAMILTON FISH, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Subcommittee on Crime, I have participated in its recent investigations into the causes behind the galloping rise in the crime rate. Although, obviously, no one factor can be singled out as the origin of that increase, some components of the problem are more responsible than others. One of these is the frightening decrease in the number of law enforcement officers patrolling our streets to keep them safe.

Those of us in New York are more acutely aware of this problem than most. In recent years, the number of law enforcement officers serving us has fallen far short of the increase in population. As we have watched the numbers of law enforcement officers dwindle, the number of offenses has risen drastically. Common sense suggests that their absence has enabled determined criminals to carry on their activities with impunity. One witness who testified before the subcommittee last year strongly recommended increasing the presence of law enforcement in this country as a solution to the crime problem. He noted that one of the reasons why Japan has the only reducing crime rate in an industrial country is because they have more police and better trained police. He further testified that Tokyo has four times as many police officers than the District of Columbia has. He concluded that "effective law enforcement, and more of it, would help prevent crime."

Mr. Speaker, because I strongly concur with the views of this witness, I am today introducing the Law Enforcement Officers' Salary Assistance Act of 1982. This would authorize the Attorney General to make grants to the States and localities for the purposes of hiring additional police officers and paying overtime. In addition, my bill would authorize special emergency grants for the same purpose. Under the act, most of the authorized funding would go to the localities, which bear the primary responsibility for law enforcement. My bill authorizes modest sums to be appropriated for this purpose during fiscal years 1982, 1983, and 1984.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that my colleagues will join me in addressing the law enforcement crisis which currently faces this country by co-sponsoring the Law Enforcement Officers' Salary Assistance Act of 1982. I am appending to my remarks a summary of that act.

HIGHLIGHTS OF LAW ENFORCEMENT OFFICERS' SALARY ASSISTANCE ACT, INTRODUCED BY HON. HAMILTON FISH, JR.

The Law Enforcement Officers' Salary Assistance Act would authorize the Attorney General to make grants to the states and localities for the purposes of hiring additional police officers and paying overtime. In addition, the Act would authorize the Attorney General to make special emergency grants for the same purposes.

A. Allocation of Funds.—Under Section 3 of the Act, of the funds appropriated in any fiscal year, 3 percent is allocated for formula grants in Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands and other territories of the United States. 85 percent of the remainder is allocated for formula grants to the States and localities, and 15 percent is allocated for emergency grants.

B. Formula Grants.—Under Section 4 of the Act, of the funds allocated to the States and localities for formula grants, one-sixth is allocated among the States, based on population. The remaining five-sixths is to be divided among local governments (including the District of Columbia) based on population and the number of FBI Crime Index offenses reported during the preceding year.

C. Emergency Grants.—Under Section 5 of the Act, the Attorney General may make an emergency discretionary grant to any state or locality which experiences an unanticipated and significant increase in the number of violent crimes committed within its jurisdiction. No individual state or locality may receive more than 10 percent of the total funds appropriated for emergency grant purposes in any fiscal year. An application for emergency assistance must identify the emergency, the amount requested, and the attempts made by the applicant to deal with the emergency. In awarding emergency grants, the Attorney General must consider the incidence of crime in the jurisdiction as compared with the number of law enforcement officers, the availability of other funds to deal with the emergency, extraordinary circumstances involved, and any federal action which may have created or aggravated the emergency.

D. Conditions of Grants.—Under Section 6 of the Act, each applicant must agree to expend grant funds received only to compensate police officers hired or returned to active duty after the effective date of the Act or to pay overtime to any police officer. The percent of grants used to make contributions to employee benefit plans may not exceed the percent of salary payments made by the jurisdiction from other sources which are devoted to such contributions. No funds may be used to pay administrative costs or to supplant payments that would otherwise be made by the jurisdiction. Section 7 of the Act authorizes the Attorney General to withhold payment to any jurisdiction if he determines that there has been noncompliance with grant conditions.

E. Reports.—Under Section 10 of the Act, the Attorney General is required to report each year to the President and the House and Senate Judiciary Committees with respect to the grants made under the Act, the types of situations for which emergency grants were made and the effects of such grants, and the procedures used by the Attorney General to insure compliance with grant conditions.

F. Authorized Appropriations.—Section 12 of the Act authorizes the appropriation of $250,000,000 during each of Fiscal Years 1982, 1983 and 1984.

ST. ANDREWS EPISCOPAL SCHOOL CELEBRATES ITS 25TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to call to the attention of my colleagues a most significant historical milestone for an outstanding school in the Fourth Congressional District I have the honor to represent. In June of this year, St. Andrews Episcopal School of Oceanside, N.Y., will celebrate its 25th anniversary. The account of the first 25 years in the life of St. Andrews is one of continued growth and success. In no small measure, this outstanding record is a tribute to the vision, dedication, and exceptional leadership of its founder, the Reverend George T. Cook, rector of St. Andrews Church for the past 35 years.

Father Cook has served as headmaster of St. Andrews School since its inception in 1957. With the dedicated support of countless friends, who gave unstintingly of their time and their financial aid, Father Cook has guided the development and growth of St. Andrews School. From a nursery and kindergarten with just 13 students in the fall of 1957 to its current status as a complete elementary and high school with approximately 220 students is truly an amazing record of steady growth and improvement.

Throughout the 25-year existence of St. Andrews School, Father Cook's guiding principle has been to create a sound academic curriculum within the framework of a Christian ethic that says: "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old, he will not depart from it." Father Cook has held to that principle through difficult years of heavy emotional and financial responsibilities.

As a result of his sound guidance, the philosophy of St. Andrews School has been able to resist the erosion of educational values and goals which has become so evident in many sectors of the American educational system.

Mr. Speaker, as one who has worked and fought for the concept of quality education throughout my years in public service, I commend to my colleagues the history of St. Andrews Episcopal School as a superlative example of how to encourage and develop quality education. The existence of outstanding private schools, such as St. Andrews, can do much to encourage the development of improved educational opportunity for all. And that, I submit to my colleagues, is a noteworthy contribution toward developing the knowledgeable citizenry which is the very basis for our great form of government.

I know my colleagues join me in saluting St. Andrews Episcopal School of Oceanside for the achievements of the past 25 years, and in wishing Father Cook, the St. Andrews faculty, and the many supporters of St. Andrews continued growth and success in the years to come.●

PROGRESS IN MEDICAL RESEARCH

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington report for Wednesday, January 20, 1982, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

PROGRESS IN MEDICAL RESEARCH

As I travel from county to county in southern Indiana, I notice widespread, continuing interest in health care among Hoosiers. They are naturally concerned about the cost, quality, and availability of health care for themselves and their families, but I sense that they are also paying close attention to the progress the nation is making as it seeks new ways to prevent, treat, and cure cancer, heart disease, stroke, arthritis, diabetes, and other serious afflictions. Although Hoosiers are insisting on economy in government, they show a strong inclination to support government spending which is intended to conquer disease and diminish the suffering associated with it.

Medical research today is a partnership between government and the private sector. In 1980, for example, about $7.9 billion (3.3 percent of all spending for health care) went to research and development. The federal government was the primary source of this funding; its contribution made up 60 percent of the national budget for research and development in health care. Private sources in industry and the non-profit sector accounted for 34 percent of the money, and state and local governments added the remaining 6 percent. Data on the actual performance of medical research reveal another side of the partnership. In 1980, higher education did 39 percent of the work; private industry and non-profit organizations accounted for 38 percent of it. The remaining 23 percent was done mostly by the federal government itself, with small portions accounted for by state and local governments and foreign institutions.

The National Institutes of Health (NIH), part of the Public Health Service, constitute the principal medical research arm of the federal government. Most of the budget of the NIH is disbursed through grants and contracts designed to obtain new knowledge in the fight against the major killing and disabling diseases prevalent in America. A two-tier process of review allows the NIH to make awards which will yield the greatest dividends per dollar invested. The first review is conducted by scientists who assess the technical quality of the work proposed. The second review is undertaken by advisory councils whose public and professional members judge the work proposed in terms of its relation to other priorities and its potential contribution to the prevention and cure of disease. Hoosiers compete with others across the nation to win these awards. In 1980, Indiana-based scientists received more than $30.6 million from the NIH.

Recent advances resulting from research supported or conducted by the NIH indicate some of the problems being addressed:

A study of mild hypertension has established the benefit of a vigorous program of treatment for the 25 million Americans who have the condition; their death rates may be cut 20 percent.

Investigators have developed a new x-ray machine which allows doctors to view internal organs in three-dimensional motion; with the machine, cancers can be more easily detected and victims of heart attack more easily treated.

A study has shown that Hodgkin's disease can be cured even in its advanced stages by a multi-drug therapy; some 7,000 people contract this form of cancer every year, and until now it has almost always been fatal.

Scientists have demonstrated the safety and effectiveness of a new vaccine against hepatitis B; programs of mass immunization may reduce the incidence of this disease, which now strikes 100,000 Americans every year.

Researchers have discovered correlations between senility and the levels of enzymes and chemicals in the brain; these findings bring us closer to understanding the causes of senility.

Investigators have succeeded in growing a virus which causes diarrhea in infants; if a vaccine can eventually be developed, millions of children around the world will be saved.

Scientists have succeeded in reversing diabetes in mice through the transplantation of healthy cells which produce insulin; this accomplishment may pave the way for a major advance in the treatment of human diabetes.

Research has indicated that fathers are often the source of the additional chromosome in children who are born with Down's Syndrome, a form of mental retardation; the finding should have important implications for genetic counseling and new avenues of research.

Investigators have found that a vitamin arrests the effects of a bone disease which may cause hip fractures in elderly women; 195,000 such fractures occur every year.

Scientists, using techniques to recombine genetic material, have succeeded in cloning tumor viruses; this achievement will help us understand the basic mechanisms behind cancer.

A study has produced evidence that the immune cells of elderly people lose the ability to fight cancer and infection; this finding will help us understand two serious conditions of old age.

Researchers have reported that certain cancer cells induce high levels of interferon, a natural anti-viral substance, when they come into contact with white blood cells; this finding supports the theory that interferon is one of the body's own defenses against cancer.

Studies have led to the development of a vaccine against pneumococcal pneumonia, a form of the disease which accounts for most of the 250,000 deaths from pneumonia in the United States every year.

Investigators have shown that a drug taken with ordinary meals can inhibit the secretion of stomach acid in certain people who have ulcers.

One clear sign of the NIH's support of excellence in medical research is the number of Nobel Laureates with whom the NIH have been associated. Since the NIH were founded in 1938, four NIH scientists have received the Nobel Prize. In addition, the NIH have supported the work of another 73 scientists who have been so honored.

Like most Hoosiers, I want the federal government to continue its efforts to assist research and development in health care. With careful administration and accounting to ensure that funds are well-spent, medical research may be one of the nation's best public investments.●

A MESS OF HIS MAKING

HON. JACK BROOKS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, the Beaumont Enterprise last Friday, January 22, 1982, carried an editorial that I believe makes a perceptive and forceful statement about the economic conditions in which we find ourselves. It points out that the recession we are now in is the result of President Reagan's policies and that there is no one else he can blame it on. I will insert the editorial in the RECORD for the Members to read.

A MESS OF HIS MAKING

President Reagan after a year in office faces the ironic prospect of being done in by his own success.

The president's overwhelming mastery of Congress throughout 1981 resulted in a new direction for federal economic policy. Although Reagan's proposals went through the inevitable process of deals and amendments without which Congress cannot operate, he obtained substantially what he asked for.

And he asked for a lot. "Ours is a high-risk presidency," one of his advisers has conceded anonymously in the Chicago Tribune. Three years of tax cuts and income-tax indexation thereafter; dismantling of much of the government's regulatory apparatus; the drastic cutting of social services; in short, a complete turnabout in the way Washington does business.

The bulk of Reagan's changes were based on the belief that they were necessary to restore economic growth and moreover, that they inevitably would lead to economic growth. But this has not happened.

A recession deeper and more lengthy than foreseen by any of the president's economic advisers has cast a bitter grip on the country. Industries previously afflicted remain moribund. Some of those prospering are using their wealth to acquire existing companies. The new investment upon which the success of Reaganomics hinges has yet to take place.

While Reagan can still after one year in office blame his predecessor's policies for the mess the country is in, to do so he must drop one of the most important arguments in favor of the supply-side theory which forms the basis of Reaganomics: the theory of expectations.

Supply-siders have argued that an oppressive, anti-business climate in Washington combined with confiscatory levels of taxation have been the major causes of declining productivity and industrial stagnation. Changing the climate by removing restrictive regulations and excessive taxes will alter business expectations and result in new investment in plants, equipment and jobs.

Instead, business, following human nature and its short-term benefit, has been influenced by a single factor, high interest rates, and decided to take the money and run.

By insisting so steadfastly on getting his own way, Reagan has left himself as the only person who can be blamed. Jimmy Carter had little to do with Reagan's deepening troubles.●

REDUCING AID FOR STUDENTS SHORTCHANGES NATION'S FUTURE

HON. SAM GEJDENSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, in this time of spiraling tuition costs and rising educational expenses, many aspiring college students and their parents rely on student aid programs to help them make their college plans a reality. The recent cuts in funding for Federal student aid programs have hit students hard, and the repercussions of these cuts will be felt for years to come. Recently, an article written by Stephen Joel Trachtenberg, the president of the University of Hartford, appeared in the New York Times on this subject. As a university administrator, he is in a unique position to analyze these cuts and their potential impact. I recommend this thoughtful piece to my colleagues.

[From the New York Times, Dec. 6, 1981]

REDUCING AID FOR STUDENTS SHORTCHANGES NATION'S FUTURE

(By Stephen Trachtenberg)

Building an annual budget at the University of Hartford has never been easy, but this year it's a pip. The university is a modestly endowed, labor intensive, independent institution founded in 1877 but chartered as a university only 25 years ago, and a lot of fancy footwork and hard work is needed to keep its books in balance. But we've done so regularly for a long, long time. It's a tradition that we intend to maintain.

In the last four years our operating costs have gone from about $17 million to approximately $40 million. Each year a greater percentage of our students, who come from all sorts of economic, ethnic and racial backgrounds, have received a larger number of scholarship dollars from our limited resources and from those generated by Federal programs, state scholarships, private foundations, corporate philanthropy, alumni and other friends of the university.

In the current academic year, 82 percent of University of Hartford students are receiving some form of financial aid from one source or another for a total estimated at $11.2 million. The University of Hartford's contribution is $2,049,739. This compares with $793,032 spent in 1977.

As we prepare for the 1982-83 academic year, the university is facing a unique challenge. Student financial support programs, carefully developed out of the G.I. Bill of Rights at the end of World War II, appear to be imperiled. Since the Reagan Administration took office in January, Federal student-aid programs have undergone three rounds of cuts. The recisions from the fiscal year 1981 budget were followed by reductions in program ceilings imposed by the Omnibus Reconciliation Act and then by Administration-proposed appropriations below the reconciliation levels. At first, excess was reduced and properly so. But the knife has now moved from fat to lean.

Cuts in the need-based student aid programs for the Government's fiscal year 1981 totaled $600 million. This affected college students and their families from coast to coast. Reduced spending ceilings for higher education programs for fiscal years 1982, 1983 and 1984 as well as appropriation limits on the Pell Grant Program and parallel efforts, such as ceilings imposed on financial aid, result in a loss of $1 billion from "current policy" funding levels, which would have permitted continued support for currently eligible students and modest growth to reflect inflation.

Eligibility for guaranteed student loans was restricted to students with family incomes of $30,000 a year or less, or unmet demonstrated need of $30,000, and a 5 percent origination fee was established for each new guaranteed loan. Moreover, the interest on loans to parents was increased from 9 percent to 14 percent. Thus, the cost of borrowing has been increased 5 percentage points for all participants in the program and the new eligibility requirements will force an undetermined number of borrowers out of the program by next year. Experts estimate that the number affected could be one million students and possibly more.

Educational benefits in the Social Security program are to be phased out entirely by fiscal year 1985, with no new recipients as of June 1982 and current beneficiaries will experience an annual reduction of 25 percent. This step alone will eliminate one of the largest sources of student support.

Some 750,000 students now receive Social Security benefits totaling $2 billion annually, or one-fifth of the total Federal student aid. Since most Social Security beneficiaries are from families with extremely low incomes, the loss of these benefits will place severe strains on the other student-aid programs, which have also been reduced.

It should now be understood that the Reagan Administration proposes cuts on top of earlier cuts. The Administration's recommendations will have the following impact.

The neediest Pell Grant recipients would receive a maximum of only $1,670 and awards for others would have to be severely reduced or even eliminated. Since it costs over $1.6 billion annually to finance students with family incomes of less than $10,000 (over 1.5 million students), passage of the Administration's request of only $2.2 billion would leave an inadequate amount to aid those above the poverty level.

The number of Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grant recipients, a campus-based grant program, would be reduced by 75,000 students.

College Work Study recipients would be reduced by 110,000.

Fifty thousand fewer students would receive National Direct Student Loan awards.

Some 30,000 state scholarships would be ended by the elimination of the $9 million in State Student Incentive Grants.

Another Administration recommendation would remove the school interest subsidy from the Guaranteed Student Loan Program. This would endanger future lending if banks are forced to bill students while in school.

The Administration's recommendations represent a 30 percent cut in the "current services" level, a 16 percent cut in the Reconciliation Act levels, a 6 percent cut in the fiscal year 1981 levels and an 11 percent cut in the fiscal 1980 levels (despite a 20 percent increase in the Consumer Price Index). It's impossible at this time to determine the exact dollar effect, for the University of Hartford, for other universities or for the individual students and their families, since Congress has not yet taken final action on the President's proposal.

At the University of Hartford we will give scrupulous attention to each request for financial assistance. Plans are under way to insure that each student receives the maximum outside assistance for which he or she is eligible. Additionally, we will see to it that an equitable part of the university's resources go to our students. Finding additional money for scholarships from within our own operating budget is of top priority. With luck and industry we hope to be able to enhance student aid in a way unprecedented in the history of the University of Hartford.

We expect to encourage and assist students and their parents in exploring their eligibility for scholarship resources through employers, fraternal organizations, unions and similar groups. Further, we plan to underscore our "family-grant" program by which a full-time undergraduate day student who is the brother, sister, parent or spouse of another full-time undergraduate day student at the university may be eligible for a 50 percent reduction in tuition. Thus, two students can come for the price of one and a half. Triplets may attend for the tuition of twins. Also, student employment opportunities will be enhanced, both during the academic year and during vacation periods.

Institutions of higher education with modest means, such as ours, have limited capacities to respond to drastic reductions in Government aid. Ingenuity and prudence will be required to squeeze every penny on behalf of our students while continuing to deliver high quality educational programs.

Education is mistakingly being perceived of by the Reagan Administration as a national expense. Nothing could be further from the truth. Properly seen, Federal and state programs in support of student aid are investments in America's young people and in ourselves. The economic and cultural future of our nation depends on there being a trained, literate, competent, skilled population. The miracle drugs of tomorrow, the rockets to the moon, the agricultural and other breakthroughs that have won this country its primary position in the 20th century have not been by accident. They are the result of material resources combined with ingenuity and hard work. Cuts in student aid programs are a false economy that we will learn to regret in the years to come.●

IMPACT OF CURRENT POLICIES

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, over the past several months I have been trying to put into words my thoughts on the mood of the country, and the impact of current policies upon our people. The following letter from a constituent of mine expressed the ideas I was grappling with, with such eloquence and with such insight, that I decided that my words were unnecessary. I would like to share the letter from this gentleman with my colleagues.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN STARK: I've corresponded (I hope communicated) with you on previous occasions.

I'm just as busy as every other working person. Most of my time is taken up with the mere struggle for survival; the never-ending battle, from the cradle to the grave.

Mr. Stark, I grew up during the depression of the thirties, in a family of eight children, back in Nebraska. I could fill an entire book writing about poverty. I shook hands with abject poverty.

I was just perusing the November 29, 1981 issue of "Parade." Read the short article about Franklin D. Roosevelt. "Too soon we get old. Too late we get smart." Seems to be a truism.

By golly, I really didn't know that John Edward Reagan, father of the incumbent President, was helped to survive by the Works Progress Administration, which was instituted by Franklin D. Roosevelt! These are the types of programs (for the young, the unemployed, the aged, the handicapped and unfortunate) which President Reagan wants to dismantle! It's sad.

Mr. Stark, I pose some questions: How the hell can we tear the guts out of our people, and still remain strong? If our people are not employed, contributing and happy, then how in heavens name can we be respected and strong any place on this earth? Please explain it to me, for I fail to comprehend.

I'll quote some words about Franklin D. Roosevelt: "Because he was born wealthy and believed firmly in the government's duty to help people who could not help themselves, he was denounced as a "traitor to his class," and a "socialist." He was neither. He was a President who promised the people a "New Deal." And he kept that promise."

I read recently where President Reagan wants more foreign aid and less domestic spending. I fail to comprehend, Mr. Stark. Please explain that to me. Also, please explain just how the money is going to "trickle down" to the unemployed.

One more question Mr. Stark: If all of the knowledge, expertise, knowhow, and the astronomical billions of dollars which finds its way to Washington, is not for the purpose of keeping people of America toward a better life, then just what is the purpose of it all? How in heaven's name can anyone tell an unemployed person to wait a couple of years to see if something will "trickle down."

I could express many more thoughts. But time doesn't permit. Just keeping in touch.

Most Sincerely,

THEODORE M. ZONA.

P.S.—Please explain the process of determining who is "truly needy" and who is not." I'm completely bewildered!●

COAST GUARD RE-APPROPRIATION BILL FOR FISCAL YEAR 1982

HON. DAVID F. EMERY

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

● Mr. EMERY. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation which I hope will have the effect of fine-tuning the fiscal year 1982 Coast Guard appropriations budget. As you will recall, the fiscal year 1982 Defense appropriations bill contained $300 million for Coast Guard vessels and aircraft, under the "Shipbuilding and Conversion, Navy" account. It is no secret that some members of the House Appropriations Committee opposed this add-on for various reasons, but the fact remains that the President signed this bill into law on December 29, 1981, and the $300 million is awaiting transfer from the Navy Comptroller's Office to the Coast Guard.

My bill would simply permit the Commandant of the Coast Guard, at his discretion, to use part of this $300 million add-on for operating expenses in addition to acquisition, construction, and improvements (ACI). My reasons are also simple. The Coast Guard had recently announced $46 million in operating expenses budget cuts for fiscal year 1982. These cuts will affect essential services in all areas of the countries, both coastal and inland. I have provided for the RECORD a copy of the Coast Guard press release from January 22, which indicates how the $46 million in savings are to be achieved. I think my colleagues will agree that these cuts will hurt virtually every State in the Union, and it is my hope that my bill will enable the Coast Guard to at least delay some of these reductions.

It is clear that my legislation will be controversial, but I would hope that all Members who care about the maintenance of essential Coast Guard services will have the courage to support me in my endeavor. It is a great shame that our first Navy, which defended the United States in her infancy, should now be funded at a woefully inadequate level, and I merely propose that the available funds be spent in a way that will maximize the many services that we have come to expect from the U.S. Coast Guard.

HON. TONY P. HALL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to encourage the States to revoke driving licenses for drunk driving convictions.

In order to be eligible to receive Federal highway safety funds, States would be required to provide for the mandatory suspension of driving privileges for drunk drivers. For fiscal 1982, this funding totals $107.3 million.

My bill would require that a driver convicted of driving while under the influence of alcohol would have his or her driver's license suspended for at least 1 year. A person convicted twice within a 5-year period would have the license permanently revoked.

I should emphasize that these revocation penalties would be minimum standards to be followed by the States. However, this is a tough crime which merits a tough penalty.

There are those who might be concerned about the impact of this legislation with respect to State's rights or the liberty of the individual. I think the best response to these objections was presented by Pastor Bruce W. Morgan of Dayton, Ohio, in the first Baptist Church Courier:

But the problem transcends the issues of State's Rights and Individual Freedom. The moral issue of protecting and safeguarding our citizenry carries a mandate worthy of federal consideration. Inevitably, the individual must bear the responsibility for his/her decisions and behavior in climbing behind the wheel of a car. But society's norms must proscribe limits to individual freedom so that the good of the whole is equally protected.

As State motor vehicle divisions across the Nation continually emphasize, driving is a privilege, not a right. Those who abuse this privilege must be prepared to suffer the consequences of losing it.

It is well known that 26,000 Americans die every year as a result of drunk driving. Just during this past 3-day New Year's Day weekend, 338 traffic fatalities were recorded. More than half of those killed were involved in alcohol-related accidents.

It is particularly alarming that so many of these accidents involve repeat drunk driving offenders. Mr. F. Jay Newberry, the prosecuting attorney in Kettering, Ohio, recently brought the following example of this to my attention:

As the Kettering Prosecutor I handle a great number of DWI prosecutions. I recently prosecuted a man for his ninth DWI offense; he had been granted driving privileges in 1980 following his eighth conviction for DWI!

We cannot permit this kind of conduct to continue. We simply have to get the drunk driver off the road.

My colleague from Maryland, Mr. Barnes, has introduced H.R. 2488, a comprehensive bill to encourage States to deter drunk driving and to punish and rehabilitate those convicted of driving while under the influence of alcohol. I support this bill and I commend its emphasis on intergovernmental cooperation to address this problem.

The bill I am introducing is intended to be compatible with H.R. 2488. My bill addresses only the mandatory license suspension issue. I think the penalties in this regard should be tougher than those in H.R. 2488. Since driving truly is a privilege, I believe that licenses should be swiftly revoked for drunk driving violations.

My legislation does not deal with the issues of mandatory prison sentences, requirements for community service, intoxication standards, State record systems, or participation in alcoholism treatment or traffic safety programs. I realize that these requirements are an important ingredient of a comprehensive and coordinated response to the challenge of drunk driving; nevertheless, my focus is the driving privilege itself. There is no reason for the States to continue to bestow the driving privilege on those who demonstrate that they are a threat both to themselves and to others when they get behind the wheel of a motor vehicle.

On an average weekend night, 1 out of every 10 drivers on the road is drunk. Admittedly, it is difficult to prevent many of these individuals from driving.

A first step, however, is to take away their licenses when they are convicted. Once these persons are off the road, we can provide the appropriate punishment, treatment, or rehabilitation each requires. Our immediate concern, though, must be to prevent them from having the opportunity to become a moving danger on our roads.

I hope that my colleagues will support this legislation. I think it could be an important part of a national effort to combat the drunk driving challenge.

For the benefit of my colleagues, the text of the bill follows:

H.R. —

A bill to amend section 402 of title 23, United States Code, relating to the establishment by each State of a program to require the mandatory suspension of persons convicted of driving while under the influence of alcohol as a part of its highway safety program.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 402(b)(1) of title 23, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(H) provide that (i) any person convicted of driving while under the influence of alcohol shall have his license or privilege to drive a motor vehicle suspended for not less than one year and that (ii) any person convicted of driving while under the influence of alcohol twice in any five year period shall have his license or privilege permanently revoked.".

SEC. 2. The amendment made by the first section of this Act shall become effective the day after the last day of the two-year period beginning on the date of enactment of this Act.●

THOUGHTS OF FEDERALISM

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, December 23, 1981, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THOUGHTS ON FEDERALISM

The relationship between Washington and the states and cities—"federalism", in a word—looms large on the nation's agenda.

Today's federalism has frequently been criticized. Experts charge that the federal government's role is too costly, unmanageable, ineffective, intrusive, and pervasive. President Reagan thinks that sound principles of federalism have all but disappeared as a guiding force in national government. Even those who support the current federal system have begun to air their misgivings about its complexity and lack of balance. The criticisms and misgivings are well-taken. Two decades ago, 132 intergovernmental fiscal programs amounted to something more than $7 billion. Today, nearly 500 such programs cost $88 billion. In 1960, intergovernmental aid went almost wholly to the states. Now, about 65,000 units of government receive it. Federal grants to state and local governments have doubled as a portion of federal outlays and state and local budgets in 20 years. More than 1,200 federal rules and regulations had been imposed on states and localities by the end of 1980, but there were almost none in 1960.

The President has a three-part program to bring about a "quiet federalist revolution". First, he favors budget cuts, not just for fiscal restraint, but also to strengthen the role of states and cities by diminishing federal power. Second, he wants to use block grants to reduce federal regulation and return control of programs to state and local governments. The ten block grants just approved by Congress are "bridges" to transfer programs from the federal to the state level. Third, he believes that the federal government has "pre-empted the states' tax base". Thus, he has spoken of turning back to the states the revenues now being "usurped" by Washington.

While the President's basic views on federalism have gained some support, progress toward his ultimate goal may not be smooth. Budget cuts curtail federal power, but they also hit state and local governments when the loss of aid cannot be easily afforded. Resistance to state and local tax hikes means that much of the loss will not be made up. Moreover, the recent tax cut is eroding revenues in many states whose taxes are linked to federal receipts, and the deficits produced by it will raise interest rates and the cost of borrowing for cities. Many state and local officials wonder how they will pay for necessary services and long-overdue repairs in infrastructure. Block grants, too, receive mixed reviews. Some governors complain that there are still too many regulatory "strings" attached to the aid. More have voiced concern that the 25 percent cut in federal funding passed along with the block grants is too great to absorb without disruption. Among the states, there is a definite feeling that the block grants mean more responsibility, little new authority, and less money. The tax turnback is the least clear part of the President's program. Although his aides are said to be studying various options, recommendations have yet to surface.

There is a clear need to "sort out" federal, state, and local roles in government by defining which governmental functions are national, state, or local, by examining how the functions are allocated among the levels, and by realigning the functions so as to restore balance to the federal system. The states prefer that Washington have welfare, housing assistance, medical benefits, and nutrition as well as national defense and economic affairs. More authority would be returned to state and local governments for education, transportation, law enforcement, and other functions which until the last two decades had been almost all theirs. Others, including the President, prefer that Washington remove itself from most domestic functions, including welfare, and return them to states, localities, and the private sector.

Several thoughts occur to me as I consider this emerging discussion of federalism:

The role of government.—The reductions in federal spending force us to think carefully about the role of government in our country. We should not accept the proposition that government is worthless. Most of us know that government has functions to perform even if we worry that it is sometimes excessive. "Sorting out" aims not to destroy government, but to make it efficient and effective.

The need for equity.—Most of us agree that cuts must be made, but if they are made then there must be equity for the middle class and the poor. Equity is not an ornament in the federal system; it is an essential aspect of it.

Pragmatism in decision-making.—We should not approach "sorting out" with preconceived notions. Our aim should be to improve the way government performs. The question is not which theory of federalism to apply, but which level of government can handle the function with the most efficiency. We should be less ideological in "sorting out", and we should be willing to try non-government options.

The importance of politics.—Our view of federalism has not evolved from a guiding doctrine of government. Rather, it has grown out of many political decisions made over the years. The result of "sorting out" will not be a neat division of functions. The nature of our federal system takes its shape, not from theory, but from the decisions which emerge from the give-and-take of the political process.

Taking care with states and cities.—In this period of fiscal restraint, heavy burdens are being placed on states and cities. They must raise enormous sums of money to rebuild infrastructure and maintain services. "Sorting out" must not be an excuse the federal government uses to ignore their needs.●

HANDGUN BODY COUNT, NOVEMBER 1981

HON. WILLIAM LEHMAN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. Speaker, the handgun body count has climbed still higher. For the month of November 1981 there are 704 reported handgun deaths. From January 1, 1981, through November 7,595 persons were victims of handguns.

It appears that 1982 will continue this tragic trend. The United States began the new year with what has become sadly typical news—handgun murders. Across the country, more than a dozen people were killed during their New Year's celebrations.

I hope this news will help persuade Congress to set a strong explicit gun control agenda, and halt the carnage.

IAN PAISLEY'S VISA

HON. JOSEPH G. MINISH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. MINISH. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commend the State Department for their wise decision of December 21, 1981, to invalidate the visa of Mr. Ian Paisley. This decision is just. It is also consistent with the general State Department policy to deny visas to people who are known to be responsible for terrorism in a foreign country.

As the leader of Ulster's militant Protestant Democratic Unionist Party, Mr. Paisley's activities serve the forces of terrorism and violence now raging in Northern Ireland. Terrorism cannot be justified, no matter in what cause it is perpetrated.

Moreover, Mr. Paisley's actions only contribute to the hardened intolerance and secular division in Northern Ireland today and consequently in inimical to our commitment to a peaceful resolution of the dispute.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the State Department exercised its legitimate right to deny visas to those whose presence they feel will not be in the interest of the United States or of world harmony. I applaud them for their judgment in the case of Mr. Paisley.●

WHY AMERICA NEEDS FARMERS

HON. JACK BRINKLEY

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Speaker, each year, the Georgia Farm Bureau Federation sponsors a statewide essay contest for all seventh graders on the topic of the importance of agriculture in American life. This year's prize-winning essay was written by an outstanding 12-year-old student from Thomaston, Ga.'s, R. E. Lee Junior High School—Miss Mandy Hughes. Mandy's award-winning essay, entitled "Why America Needs Farmers," triumphed over 80 other entries. The daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Alton Hughes, Mandy was named Upson County's 1980 Outstanding Cloverleaf 4-H'er and is a talented musician and public speaker.

Mandy's thoughtful commentary on the vital role of farmers to the community, State, and Nation provides insight and understanding far beyond her years. I commend a careful reading of the enlightening text which follows to my distinguished colleagues:

WHY AMERICA NEEDS FARMERS

One reason America is a great nation is because she is a well-fed nation. For this, we can thank our farmers. America would not long remain great without her farmers.

One only need look at the communist block countries, such as the Soviet Union, to see that their biggest problem is feeding their people. These are countries with natural resources equal to ours. They have bought agricultural equipment and technology from us, and still they can not produce as well as we.

With equal resources and equipment why is it that American agriculture is superior? Not only are our farmers collectively outproducing those of the other nations, they do it with less people. This frees a high percentage of our population to work at other jobs, which contributes to making our nation great.

Farmers are the root of many jobs. Through their efforts, others process, promote and market agriculture products, thus increasing American farm trade.

America needs her farmers for more than just the obvious reasons. Sure, they supply us with food and fiber; but more important than this, they represent the main spoke in America's wheel of progress.●

EL SALVADOR

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Foreign Affairs Newsletter for December 1981 into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

EL SALVADOR

The United States backs the moderate junta in El Salvador. It contends that the centrist government of Jose Napoleon Duarte is the only alternative to control by the extreme rightist military or the extreme leftist guerrillas. The main issue for the United States is whether to stay with the junta as it moves toward elections or to push for a negotiated settlement.

The roots of the conflict in El Salvador are found in the heavy concentration of wealth and power in the hands of a few Salvadorans. In 1973, for example, the top 10 percent of the population owned 80 percent of the land, while the bottom 10 percent owned only 0.4 percent. Over half the country's people had annual incomes below $250 that year.

During the 1960's and 1970's the traditional structures of authority in El Salvador, already eroded by growing social and economic tensions, began to disintegrate. Violence spread, and in an attempt to stabilize the country and stimulate evolutionary change a cadre of military men overthrew the government of Carlos Humberto Romero in the fall of 1979. Since then, three civilian-military juntas have ruled El Salvador, the last led by Mr. Duarte. Each junta has struggled to stop the violence, initiate reforms, and hold elections. Many Salvadorans were pleased with the long overdue reforms, but extremists of both the left and right reacted by intensifying the violence. About 12,000

Salvadorans died in 1980 in circumstances of rising chaos. The civilian death toll nearly exceeded 11,000 in the first nine months of 1981.

The politics of violence in El Salvador date back decades, and the forces of violence still hold sway there today. On the far right are many groups, including ORDEN, an organization with a rural base and close ties to local security forces. These groups have employed tactics of indiscriminate assassination over the last several years. The control of rightist violence has been hampered by the disruption of the courts and by the ongoing war. It is alleged that rightist groups are tied to elements in the armed forces.

Althought the right-wing groups pose a serious threat, an equally great danger comes from armed groups of the far left and the so-called "popular organizations". In a series of secret strategy sessions, the Cuban government apparently unified these groups with other disaffected Salvadorans to form the DRU and the FDR. The first is a paramilitary organization; the second is a political one. Both receive substantial assistance from Cuba. The armed ranks of the guerrillas may number some 3,000 to 4,000, and they have much freedom of movement in rural regions. However, their ability to undermine the Duarte government has not been shown. Their "final offensive" of January, 1981, failed without generating much popular support.

Although the extremist groups of both the left and right continue to try to impose their will on El Salvador, most Salvadorans seem to desire no more than an end to the violence. The Duarte government has made some progress. In March of this year, a special commission was appointed to prepare for elections to a constituent assembly in 1982, and in July a law was passed making all parties which accept democratic procedures eligible to participate in the elections. Whether the elections can be successful in a climate of violence remains to be seen. The Duarte government hopes gradually to establish civilian authority, induce the military to abstain from involvement in politics, and bring the far right under control. It has banned paramilitary forces and has improved the nation's security somewhat, but grave problems remain. The armed forces themselves continue to commit abuses, thereby playing into the guerrillas' hands. They have some 20,000 in their ranks and they are better trained, but they have not been able to win on the battlefield.

Progress on land and banking reforms has been slow, but the Duarte junta has shown that change, albeit modest, can come by institutional means. The church, trade unions, agrarian organizations, professional bodies, and businesses are becoming more engaged in the search for peace. The emerging consensus against violence could be important in the coming months. There is no consensus, however, on the best way to end the violence. The Duarte government rejects negotiations with the guerrillas and seeks to establish itself through elections even if the guerrillas do not participate. The guerrillas want to talk, but perhaps only to gain time.

The policy of the United States is to support self-determination for the people of El Salvador, to help create a process leading to free elections, to back the Duarte government with economic and military aid as it tries to reform, and to help put an end to all terrorism. At the root of its policy is the belief that the only alternatives to the far-from-perfect Duarte junta are unacceptable extremists on the right or left. The United States also seeks to stop the flow of arms into guerrilla hands, and it is against negotiations at this time. Opposition to talks has put the United States at odds with some of its major European allies and Mexico, which favor a negotiated settlement as the least expensive and quickest solution. In addition to diplomatic support, the United States has given economic and military aid to El Salvador, the former three times as ample as the latter. Nearly $200 million in economic aid has been sent to El Salvador in 1980 and 1981. A small contingent of American military advisers forms part of the program of military aid.

The savage events of recent years have created enmities in El Salvador which will not be forgotten soon. Salvadoran society is deeply divided today—and very well armed. The process of healing, once begun, will take time. Most Salvadorans want that process to start. The future holds the battlefield, the ballot box, or negotiation. There is deadlock on the battlefield; fair elections or fruitful negotiations will be very difficult to conduct. The United States must persist in its efforts to find a settlement which reflects the will of the Salvadoran people.●

SUBSIDIZING RACISM

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, the Reagan administration's recent decision to overturn the 11-year-old Federal policy of prohibiting tax exemptions to segregated schools demonstrates its profound insensitivity to the effects of descrimination. None of the administration's further actions on the issue have altered one meaning of the original decision—that segregated institutions may be supported by the Nation's taxpayers. The following New York Times editorial and op-ed piece of January 12 and 19, aptly describe the racial insensitivity of the administration's decision:

SUBSIDIZING RACISM

(By Tom Wicker)

With its decision to grant a Federal tax exemption to segregated private schools, the Reagan Administration has moved from a lack of interest in fighting racial discimination to active promotion of it.

Never mind the sophistical explanation being offered. An 11-year-old Federal policy—first in effect under President Nixon—has been reversed. The reversal restores tax exemption to more than 100 private schools and other organizations that had lost it because they practiced segregation.

Many more segregated schools that have never been tax-exempt will now gain that status. And new segregated schools will be organized to take advantage of the policy reversal. Those who contribute to any of these schools can take a Federal tax deduction for doing so; and all the schools will be excused from paying unemployment, Social Security and Federal income taxes.

If that isn't actively promoting racial discrimination, what is? And it's out of the taxpayers' pockets at that.

No wonder, therefore, that Representative Shirley Chisholm of Brooklyn declared in Richmond, Va., in services memorializing Martin Luther King, Jr.:

"The dreams of the 60's and 70's have turned into the shrinking reality of the 80's. . . . We [blacks] must realize that the gains made during the past 15 years are being taken away one by one."

Here's only a partial record:

The Reagan Administration has said it will no longer seek or enforce busing orders for school desegregation.

The Justice Department will seek reversal of a Supreme Court decision approving a voluntary affirmative action program—despite President Reagan's apparent approval of it at a news conference.

Mr. Reagan wants to water down a 10-year extension of the Voting Rights Act already passed by the House.

Neither he nor the Justice Department has lifted a finger to oppose a pending Senate bill that would strip the Supreme Court of jurisdiction in school segregation cases.

There's plenty more. Mr. Reagan's budget cuts have hit hardest at minorities and the poor. His economic policies have produced 8.9 percent unemployment—a figure expected to hang above 9 percent in coming months—and that translates into 16.1 percent unemployment for blacks, a rate near the record.

But at least the Administration can argue plausibly that busing hasn't worked, although there's ample evidence to the contrary. It claims to be opposed only to "goals and quotas," not to affirmative action itself. And Mr. Reagan belatedly says he supports extension of the Voting Rights Act—but only with the changes he wants.

Similarly, the Administration now argues that its tax-exemption ruling is not an endorsement of school segregation. The nondiscrimination policy of the last 11 years, it says, gives the Internal Revenue Service too much power; only Congress should have the authority to decide who gets tax exemption and who doesn't.

That does not just happen to be what discriminatory schools like Bob Jones University in Greenville, S.C., have been saying in Federal court. It does not just happen to be the reverse of what the Justice Department was telling the courts as recently as September. It does not just happen to fly in the face of a three-judge Federal court's order in 1971, later affirmed by the Supreme Court, holding that the Government could not legally grant tax exemption to racially discriminatory private schools.

All of that is quite deliberate, as is the Administration's ignoring of the fact that Congress has had ample opportunity in 11 years to legislate policy if it felt the need, or to change existing policy—which was, in fact, at least partially based on legislative history as unanimously interpreted by the Nixon, Ford and Carter administrations.

Not even the most ardent Reaganites will be able to claim a "mandate" from the people for Mr. Reagan's reversal of this longstanding and widely accepted Federal effort to penalize existing discrimination and prevent more. But it's not hard to see why the Administration acted as it did.

Its decision to reward segregated schools pleases many hard-right conservatives—not just Southerners—and is a sop to Chairman J. Strom Thurmond of the Senate Judiciary Committee. It lines up the Administration with the Mormon Church and with numerous fundamentalist religious groups that, like Bob Jones University, profess to find bibilical authority for racial segregation. Mr. Reagan's previous emphasis on the economy, rather than on "social issues," has not pleased these elements.

Nor does the President think he has much to fear from blacks, few of whom ever supported him. But he may learn better, as have others before him, if they heed Shirley Chisholm's advice: "Get your marching boots ready!"

IT'S STILL TAX-EXEMPT HATE

White House post-mortems notwithstanding, the decision to give tax breaks to segregated private schools cannot be blamed on bad staffing or inept politics. The excuses fail for a simple reason: the President clings to the new racist policy. Even after being fully informed, he wants to start granting those exemptions and keep on going until Congress passes a new law forbidding them.

Bad staffing there surely was. Someone should have known that present law, as construed by the Federal courts, already forbids tax exemptions for schools that discriminate by race. A court order to that effect already binds the Internal Revenue Service. The I.R.S. even risks contempt if it tries to exempt any segregated school in one state, Mississippi. But if the staff blundered, that doesn't explain adhering to the blunder.

Bad politics? Apparently only in the execution, says Edwin Meese, Mr. Reagan's counselor. He says he should have had a bill drafted and ready for release with the new policy. But the President's decision was good politics, according to the political game now being played with Senator Strom Thurmond and other fans of the white academies.

What lesson does the White House draw from the experience? That it needs better decision-making machinery. One official predicts the creation of a Cabinet "council on legal policy" to keep tabs on the government's litigation. There's a law about that on the books already. It creates a "Department of Justice," headed by an "Attorney General." Can't he be relied on to tell the President the legal truth? If he's not smart enough or tough enough to do so, why look to some council coordinator?

Contrary to tax law, against the grain of every civil rights achievement in a generation, at odds with three prior Administrations, Ronald Reagan voluntarily permits tax benefits to flow to segregated institutions, even to those that don't even deny their racial bias.

However obfuscated, however perfumed, that's still tax-exempt hate.●

MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR. DAY

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, the thousands of people who marched to the Capitol on January 15 served as an extension of the numerous demonstrations held in towns and cities all across our country celebrating the birthdate of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. Churches, civic associations, and public offices throughout New Jersey's 10th Congressional District participated that day in paying tribute to one of America's greatest human rights advocates, and truly one of our national heroes. The time is long overdue for Congress to recognize Dr. King's special place in our Nation's history by designating January 15 a national legal holiday.

It takes a rare person or an extraordinary event to justify a new national holiday. Martin Luther King, Jr. was much more than a rare person. He was unique in American history—as a man, as a leader, and as an advocate for freedom and justice. Dr. King did more than any other American to arouse the conscience of this Nation to live up to its great ideals and goals. Making his birthday a legal holiday, celebrated by all Americans in all 50 States, will provide an annual opportunity for our Nation to reflect on our goals for advancing civil rights. There is still much work to be done to assure equal opportunity for education, employment, and housing for all Americans, and I believe that January 15 would be a most appropriate day for us as a nation to focus on these issues.

I fervently hope that this will be the year when we finally enact legislation I have joined in sponsoring to designate January 15 a national holiday. The Nation has already had to wait too long for this simple act of commitment to civil rights and of tribute to a man of peace.●

ELIAS KARMON, BRONX LEADER

HON. JONATHAN B. BINGHAM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, new entries are being made in the history books of the Bronx this month as one of our great civic leaders, Mr. Elias Karmon, steps down as president of the Bronx Chamber of Commerce. Mr. Karmon has been working in and for the Bronx for some 40 years, and I will bet retiring as president of the chamber does not signal the end of this dedicated career. Elias Karmon will continue to be one of the most deeply involved residents of our borough. The Congress is full of busy men, but most of us would find the activities of this man staggering. Not only has he been continually successful as a businessman, but he has taken time to work with dozens of groups and organizations to keep the Bronx a good place to work and live. His example of staying to fight against urban blight rather than giving up and moving somewhere else has been inspiring Bronxites for years, and the Bronx is a better place because of it. As he put it himself in his report to the Bronx Chamber last year:

The intended demise of the Bronx was not accepted by the many who lived and worked here and who had established their roots here. Its tenacious people showed its great strength, an alloy forged in the pride of its past history, its purposeful present, its potential future. With all of its ethnic groups working together in a wholesome relationship, the people labored amidst the rubble to recreate their neighborhoods.

Mr. Speaker, spirit and effort like this can rebuild our cities * * * my colleagues, Representatives MARIO BIAGGI, ROBERT GARCIA, and PETER PEYSER join me in saluting Mr. Karmon on his leadership, and I include at this point in my remarks a brief summary of his impressive career from Cornucopia, the newsletter of the Bronx Venture Corp.

ELIAS KARMON, DISTINGUISHED BUSINESSMAN PHILANTHROPIST, HEADS BVC ADVISORY GROUP

Currently completing his fourth consecutive term as President of the Bronx Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Elias Karmon has accepted the position of Chairman of the Business Advisory Committee of Bronx Venture Corporation. A civic leader in the Bronx for 40 years he has been active with many business, civic, health, service and fund-raising organizations. He also served as President of the Bronx Rotary Club, Chairman of the Bronx Council of the Albert Einstein College of Medicine, Vice President of the American Jewish Congress, Bronx District and Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Bronx Boys Club.

One of the founders of the Ponce de Leon Federal Savings and Loan Association, he still serves on its Board and on its Loan Committee. In addition he currently serves on the Boards of the Y.M.C.A., Bronx House, The Bronx Girls Club, Bronx Frontier Development Corporation, Fordham Road Area Development Corporation, Regional Aid for Interim Needs, The Pelham Parkway Mall Local Development Corporation, Lincoln Community Mental Health Center, the South Bronx Community Housing Corporation and the Pelham Parkway Jewish Center.

Mr. Karmon was a member of the Lay Advisory Board of the old Lincoln Hospital and during his nine years as its chairman, the Lay Board obtained the commitment for the building of the new Lincoln Hospital.

He is also a Past Chairman of the Bronx Urban League Advisory Committee of which he was a founding member when the Urban League opened its first Bronx office in 1950. Mr. Karmon is also a life member of the N.A.A.C.P.

His dedication to community services has earned him recognition from the Bronx Council of Churches; Bronx Urban League; National Conference of Christians and Jews; Bronx Boys Club; Y.M.C.A.; American Red Cross; the Albert Einstein College of Medicine; Bronx County American Legion; Morris High School; East Bronx Community Council; Council of Spanish American Organizations of Greater New York; Borinquen Post, American Legion; South Bronx Kids on the March; Institute of Applied Human Dynamics; Mount Carmel Baptist Church; United Jewish Appeal and the State of Israel.

In 1979 he received the coveted Jefferson Award for Public Service on the Bill Boggs Mid-Day Live Show on Channel 5.

A graduate of New York University, he worked as an accountant; a manufacturer of clothing; builder of parking lots; developer of buildings for use by public and private agencies and in the retail clothing business on Prospect Avenue. Hollywood Clothes was an institution in the Bronx for more than 30 years.

Beginning in 1958 he took over the R.K.O. Franklin Theater and used it for annual Christmas parties for 3,200 children from local schools, Boy and Girl Scout troops, settlement houses, P.A.L. and church groups.

Mr. Karmon is President of EMK Enterprises, Inc., a real estate firm with offices on Prospect Avenue where he has conducted his business enterprises since 1940.

Mr. Karmon attributes his success to hard work and persistence. He plans to write a book about his experiences as a businessman and philanthropist. Mr. Karmon resides in the Bronx with his wife Sylvia. They have two children, both married.●

THE OUTLOOK FOR 1982

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, January 25, 1982

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, January 6, 1982, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THE OUTLOOK FOR 1982

Polls tell us that Americans are in a gloomy mood as they enter 1982. They are anxious about the state of their country and worried about inflation. They feel the pinch of recession and see a real chance that nuclear war will break out somewhere in the world within the next five years.

From my vantage point in the Congress, I understand why Americans are so concerned. I think that we face a difficult year in 1982. The economy is in recession as the year begins, and not until many months into the year will we see an upturn. The international situation remains highly dangerous. The United States is stymied by the suppression of freedom in Poland; the turmoil in the Caribbean and Central America is not likely to subside; prospects for progress in arms control talks with the Soviet Union and peace negotiations in the Middle East are not encouraging. There are some bright spots, to be sure. Inflation is slowing, interest rates may be sliding downward until mid-year at least, and supplies of energy appear to be sufficient. By the end of 1982, the United States will become the first country in the world to turn out more than $3 trillion worth of goods and services annually.

On the economy, the consensus among the forecasters shows a continued decline well into early 1982 and a pick-up about mid-year. The unemployment picture is grim, with a peak of 9 percent projected during the first few months of the year. With a little luck, inflation could be reduced to its lowest annual rate in five years. The crucial question is where the economy will go in the second half of the year—that is, how strong the recovery will be. Interest rates may hold the key. The level of interest rates will depend in part on the size of the federal deficit, and the outlook is for record-breaking deficits during the next few years.

Control of the budget now looms as the most difficult challenge facing the Congress and the President. To achieve control, the choices are a delay in the income tax cut recently enacted by the Congress, an increase in other taxes, or a precipitous cut in the level of federal spending.

As the past year's budget battles clearly indicate, 1982 will almost certainly be a volatile year in the Congress. Members are not in the mood for another round of deep budget cuts. There simply is not all that much to be trimmed unless we look at previously untouchable programs. If we exempt defense, interest on the national debt, and entitlement programs such as social security, then according to the Congressional Budget Office every other program administered by the federal government would have to be cut 75 percent in order to get a balanced budget by 1984.

It is a safe prediction that the fight over spending will intensify in 1982. Although the specifics are not yet clear, some moves will certainly be made in the Congress to raise taxes in 1982. There are several options: increase excise taxes, tax windfall profits on deregulated natural gas, or increase user fees. Strong efforts will be made to slow the increase in defense spending sought by the President. The Congress will try to avoid action on social security in an election year, but whether it succeeds in avoiding such action will depend on the revenues generated for social security by the economic recovery. If not in 1982, the Congress will soon thereafter have to deal with the exploding cost of medicare and medicaid, which has reached about $65 billion a year. The President is also expected to recommend additional reductions in the food stamp program.

Several social issues long kept off the congressional agenda—such as abortion, busing, and school prayer—are likely to come back in force this year. The chance that the Voting Rights Act will be extended is improving. Other issues likely to engage the Congress will be a curb on immigration, the safe disposal of nuclear waste, the extension of the Clean Air Act, the reorganization of the Department of Energy and Education, and the revision of the Federal Criminal Code.

Listing the world's 1982 hot spots is relatively easy, but predicting where trouble will probably break out next is virtually impossible. New strains are clearly visible in the Western alliance as differences in policy continue to arise between the United States and its friends in Europe. These differences will occupy much of our time in 1982. Soviet-American cooperation will be minimal, and progress on arms control slight. The United States will have to push harder for peace in the Middle East, or else the situation there will deteriorate further. As things stand today, the region could become a battleground at almost any moment.

Other issues of international relations will crowd in upon the Congress this year. The United States must move to regain the initiative in the Caribbean and Central America, with cooperative programs of economic aid, trade, and security assistance. We will face trouble in our fast-developing relationship with China if we furnish sophisticated aircraft to Taiwan. The United States must reduce its massive trade imbalance with Japan. If it does not, protectionist sentiments will grow and eventually prevail in the Congress. The United States must also continue to press Japan to bolster its defense forces. The key to improved American relations with black Africa is success in helping Namibia achieve independence, which depends in turn on South Africa's approval and support of an American plan.

We should begin 1982 with a clear sense of the number, variety, and difficulty of the challenges which await us.●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Tuesday, January 26, 1982, may be found in the Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Tuesday, January 26, 1982

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Reverend John I. Kulish, of St. Michael's Ukrainian Orthodox Church, Hudson, N.Y., offered the following prayer:

Let us all pray. Eternal God, Lord of Heaven and Earth, Father and Creator of everything visible and invisible, having lifted our hearts to Heaven, we stand before Thy Majesty and give thanks for mercy and bounty which Thou hast bestowed upon us here in our great United States of America.

We humbly beseech thee to protect our President, our Government, the Armed Forces of the United States, its people, and all who defend freedom and democracy.

Bestow upon them wisdom and knowledge so that they may never abandon the way of truth and let them champion freedom and liberty of Ukraine and all captive nations in the world.

Take us under Thy protection and grant all countries a bright and glorious future. We put our trust in Thee, we glorify Thee now and ever and unto ages of ages. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a resolution of the House of the following title:

H. Con. Res. 244. Concurrent resolution providing for a joint session of Congress to receive a message from the President on the state of the Union.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER CONCERNING DISTURBANCE IN THE GALLERY

The SPEAKER. The visitors in the gallery will please maintain order. That is one of the rules of the House.

REV. JOHN I. KULISH

(Mr. STRATTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the House of Representatives I am delighted to express our thanks and appreciation to Father John Kulish of St. Michael's Ukrainian Orthodox Church of Hudson, N.Y., for having offered the prayer this morning.

Father Kulish is accompanied by his wife and by his daughter, Andrea, and, as a matter of fact, during the moments before the convening of the House, Andrea had her picture painted by the majority leader of the House. It is one of the fantastic, but not often well-known, talents of the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT).

The occasion for having Father Kulish here was today we are celebrating the anniversary of the independence of the Ukraine and the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) and I have taken a special order and we hope that other Members will join in expressing their sentiments with regard to the continuing captivity of the people of the Ukraine.

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York, in whose district Father Kulish actually lives.

Mr. SOLOMON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, it is a real pleasure to have not only a great religious leader in America present with us today, but a great American as well. It was my pleasure to be one of the principal speakers at the World Anti-Communist League of Captive Nations Week Conference in Taipei, Taiwan, last August and I would like to commend Father Kulish and his family for their continuing efforts on behalf of the Ukrainian people and all of the captive nations people who are being held captive in this world today.

It is a real pleasure to have him here. We hope he and his family enjoy their stay.

GUARANTEED STUDENT LOANS

(Mr. PEYSER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Speaker, it has become the announced intention of the administration to remove the students who are in graduate and professional schools from eligibility under guaranteed student loans. This move, Mr. Speaker, will create havoc among graduate students who are presently in school and those who are planning to go.

It is the only program that is available to graduate students. The administration is saying these students instead will be eligible for the parent loan, which in effect would mean, Mr. Speaker, that students attending school while attending graduate school, would have to be paying over their graduate career nearly $11,000 in interest.

I can tell the Members that graduate students do not have that kind of money and in effect, Mr. Speaker, we will be eliminating thousands and thousands of our most talented people from programs that we desperately need.

TAX BREAKS TO PRIVATE SCHOOLS THAT PRACTICE RACIAL SEGREGATION

(Mr. JACOBS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago I introduced a resolution which states simply that the law with regard to denial of income tax breaks to segregated private schools is adequate to prevent those breaks at present.

Because of the puzzling actions by the administration within the past several days, a lot of people have been led to believe that new law is necessary to deny Government aid in the form of tax breaks to private schools that practice racial segregation.

But as the resolution states, that is not true. Pursuant to regulation reasonably designed to fairly determine such segregation the IRS should forthwith resume the law-abiding policy of denying such tax breaks to schools that practice racial segregation.

Mr. Speaker, the IRS is supposed to stand for Internal Revenue Service, not Institute of Racial Segregation.

As for the administration's proposed new law on the subject and the arduous process required to pass such law, it seems useful to recall one of the cardinal principles in which the President is said to believe, "If it ain't broke, don't fix it." Except for whatever damage the administration may have done to it by unfortunate announcements lately, the law against government aid to racially segregated schools "ain't broke" and should be obeyed and enforced by the administration.

NATIONAL AIRPORT—AN ACCIDENT WAITING TO HAPPEN

(Mr. PARRIS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, we in Congress can no longer ignore the problems at the Washington Metropolitan National Airport. Something must be done to remedy the potentially hazardous conditions that exist there. In the past a number of my colleagues have cited National's safety record as reasons for not correcting the airport's inadequacies. That safety record ended tragically January 13 when an Air Florida 737 crashed into the 14th Street Bridge killing 78 persons.

In the recent past, some of my colleagues and I have tried to suggest on a number of occasions that National is an accident looking for a place to happen. With the physical conditions that exist today, this tragedy was inevitable. For example, if the fatal flight 90 had taken off from Dulles Airport, the pilot would have had a runway double the length of the runway at National to help him make a decision as to whether or not to abort the flight. At National Airport there is 6,800 feet of runway length and at Dulles the runway is 11,500 feet.

From a broader perspective, Washington Metropolitan National Airport has the shortest runway in the Nation compared to other major airports. In fact, National Airport has the shortest runway compared to the next level of airports, except for Burbank, Calif. And believe it or not, 80 percent of the third-level airports have runways longer than National's, including cities like Champaign, Ill., and Lafayette, La.

Not only is the runway short at National but the pressure caused by the burdens of heavy traffic there is unrelenting—and needless, when you consider the fact that we have a modern jet facility available at Dulles. To show you the terrible flight operations imbalance that we have today, there are 66 operations a day between the Washington metropolitan area and Chicago. One flight uses Dulles.

I call upon my colleagues to support a shifting of flights from National Airport to Dulles and Balitmore Washington International Airports. I do not want to close National, but for safety's sake, we must respond to this tragedy by insuring that never again will a pilot be faced with a combination of bad weather, short runways, and the pressure of bumper to bumper air traffic.

PRODUCTS LIABILITY ACT OF 1982

(Mr. SHUMWAY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, on December 14 I introduced H.R. 5214, the Products Liability Act of 1982. Simply stated, my bill establishes a uniform system of products liability law for products manufactured and introduced into interstate commerce. Today, a product marketed in all 50 States is subject to 50 different codes of products liability law. A consumer injured by a product in one State may be entitled to compensation from the manufacturer, while existing law in another State may deny an identical consumer any compensation whatsoever for the same or similar injury caused by the same product. Although I have consistently supported efforts to allow the States to retain existing and to achieve greater authority and control over their own affairs, in this instance it is clear that uniformity is highly desirable and urgently needed.

In addition to consumers, the problems caused by lack of products liability uniformity are serious for business in general, and small business in particular. The confusion created by the existence of the many differing State laws forces insurance premiums to be calculated on the basis of the law in that State where a product's liability is the greatest. Unfortunately, some States place no limits on a given manufacturer's liability. Producers of products sold decades ago, which might have been altered or have changed hands several times, may be sued when these products cause injury. Cases are becoming more extreme, and awards more excessive, with each passing year. As a consequence, insurance premiums and the deductibles for these premiums have skyrocketed, resulting in increasingly burdensome costs for consumers and manufacturers alike.

We attempted to partially correct the problem of escalating costs with passage in the last session of the Risk Retention Act (Public Law 97-45). This law makes it possible for small businesses to self-insure and to purchase insurance on a group basis at more favorable rates. The Risk Retention Act is important. It does not, however, address the actual problems of products liability law that precipitated its passage; namely, that no precise parameters exist that define conditions under which manufacturers are to be held liable for those products which they produce. My legislation is intended to fully and equitably address these problems.

H.R. 5214 is a comprehensive bill; one that deals with all major issues germane to products liability actions. Its provisions are based on the hearings record and work of previous Congresses, and on the input of leading academicians and practicing products liability lawyers.

H.R. 5214 is a balanced bill; one that protects both consumers and manufacturers. If enacted, the stability that such law would bring to the costly and confusing area of products liability can be expected to benefit the economy by protecting jobs, reducing legal and insurance costs, and enhancing the incentive for the production and improvement of manufactured goods. For consumers, H.R. 5214 provides protection against faulty or defective products, and from those which have been poorly designed.

The bill meets these objectives by: Clearly defining the basic standards of responsibility for manufacturers and product sellers other than manufacturers; establishing reasonable periods of time during which a products liability action must be brought; protecting manufacturers from liability where unreasonable product misuse or alteration was the cause of an injury; protecting the public from products dangerously designed, or designed in a manner inconsistent with the industry or accepted standard, or inconsistent with mandatory State, local, and Federal government standards; providing an equitable system for the determination and award of punitive damages.

H.R. 5214 provides the needed guidelines for State courts to fairly adjudicate products liability actions. My bill establishes no bureaucracy; it requires no Federal funding. I introduce it because it is a fair and effective response to the inequities and disparities which have characterized products liability law in the past. Its enactment will benefit consumers and manufacturers alike and the economy in general. I therefore commend the bill, as well as the section-by-section analysis which follows, to the attention of my colleagues:

SECTION-BY-SECTION SUMMARY OF H.R. 5214

SECTION 1

The title of the Act is the "Products Liability Act of 1982."

This section provides findings and purposes underlying the need for this legislation.

Findings include the complexity, inconsistency, and uncertainty of state products liability laws; the effects of uncertainty and confusion of such products liability laws on our nation; and the little that any one state can do to ameliorate these difficulties because products liability insurance rates are determined on a national basis.

Purposes include the fair, prompt, and efficient resolution of products liablity claims.

SECTION 3

This section defines certain terms used throughout the Act.

Subsection (1) defines "commerce" to comply with the Commerce Clause of the Constitution.

Subsection (2) defines "State" to include all possessions, territories of the United States.

Subsection (3) defines "person" very broadly (e.g., individuals, corporations, partnerships) and includes any Federal, State or local governmental entity.

Subsection (4) defines "product" to mean any "object capable of delivery" including components. This definition expressly excludes human tissue, organs, or blood and its components.

Subsection (5) defines a "products liability action" to mean any claim or action brought by a claimant against a product seller for harm caused by a product. This expression is defined to include actions previously based on strict liability in tort, negligence, breach of warranty, misrepresentation, concealment, or nondisclosure (whether intentional, negligent or innocent), manufacturer's liability, products liability, or otherwise.

Subsection (6) defines "claimant" to include persons harmed and their legal representatives.

Subsection (7) defines "harm" to include damage to property (other than product itself), personal physical injuries (including death), and pain or mental harm resulting from personal physical injuries. It expressly does not include commercial loss.

Subsection (8) defines "manufacturer" to include any wholesaler, distributor or retailer who "plays a significant role" in designing, producing, making, assembling, fabricating, constructing, altering, modifying, or remanufacturing the aspect of the product which injures claimant. The definition of "manufacturer" excludes one who merely distributes a product, or who assembles, services, or otherwise prepares the product as authorized by the manufacturer.

Subsection (9) defines "product seller" in broad terms. However, it excludes sellers of realty (except if the person is engaged in the mass production and sale of standardized dwellings), providers of professional services, and persons acting only in a financial capacity who are not manufacturers, wholesalers, distributors or retailers.

Subsection (10) defines "representation" to mean explicit statements, affirmations, promises or descriptions.

Subsection (11) defines "feasible" as practicable within available technical and scientific knowledge which has been adequately demonstrated and economically feasible, at the time of manufacture.

Subsection (12) defines "preponderance of the evidence" to require proof establishing that it is more probable than not that a fact occurred.

Subsection (13) defines "clear and convincing evidence" to require proof to produce a firm conviction as to the allegations sought to be established. This provision provides that the requisite proof is greater than that required by preponderance of the evidence, but is less than that required for proof beyond a reasonable doubt.

SECTION 4

This section provides for the Act's preemption of state law and clarifies that Federal jurisdiction is not created.

Subsection (a) provides that the Act supersedes Federal and State law to the extent such law is inconsistent with the Act.

Subsection (b) provides that the Act does not create a new Federal cause of action nor vest subject matter jurisdiction in any Federal district court where it does not already exist.

SECTION 5

This section provides for standards of responsibility for manufacturers.

Subsection (a) provides that for liability to obtain against a manufacturer, the claimant must prove by a preponderance of the evidence one of the following: (1) the product was unreasonably dangerous in construction; (2) the product was unreasonably dangerous in design; (3) the product was unreasonably dangerous because of a failure to provide adequate warnings, or instructions; or (4) the product was unreasonably dangerous because it did not conform to manufacturer's representation.

The subsequent subsections provide the principles to be used to determine whether a product was unreasonably dangerous. Additionally, claimant must prove that the unreasonably dangerous aspect of the product was the proximate cause of harm; and that the defendant manufactured the product. This subsection also provides that generally, any matter that must be established cannot be proved by showing the outcome of a previous lawsuit.

Subsection (b) provides that for a product to be unreasonably dangerous in construction, it must be shown to deviate from the manufacturer's design or performance standards or from otherwise identical units.

Subsection (c) provides that for a product to be unreasonably dangerous in design, it must be shown that an alternative design was available, which on balance would have been "better" than the chosen design (defined to mean safer, both as to the alleged hazard and as to overall safety; neither more expensive nor less useful or desirable unless warranted by the added safety benefits; and not in violation of statutes, regulations, or mandatory safety standards), and which would have been capable of preventing claimant's harm.

Subsection (d) provides that for a product to be unreasonably dangerous because of a failure to provide adequate warnings or instructions, it must be shown that danger or safety information was available to the manufacturer; was "reasonably necessary" (which is defined to refer to information concerning significant dangers which would be useful to persons likely to use the product other than information with respect to obvious or known dangers; trivial dangers; uses other than those that would be reasonably expected of an ordinary person; or uses associated with alterations or modifications that would not be expected of an ordinary person); or was not effectively provided to an "appropriate person" (defined to mean the product user, if feasible; a person reasonably expected to pass them on to the product user; in the case of certain products, an expert licensed to use them; in the case of products used in a work place, the employer or person having custody of the product; in the case of components, raw materials or bulk products, the manufacturer's immediate vendee); and if provided, the warnings would have prevented the claimant's harm.

Subsection (e) provides that for a product to be unreasonably dangerous because it did not conform to the manufactuer's representation, it must be shown that claimant relied on an untrue representation. Negligence or fraud need not be shown.

This section provides for standards of responsibility for product sellers other than manufacturers.

Subsection (a) provides that a product seller may be liable only if preponderance of evidence shows that the product was the proximate cause of the claimant's harm, and that the product seller failed to use reasonable care with respect to the product. However, for liability to obtain, the product seller must have known of the danger that harmed claimant or have had reason and an opportunity to inspect the product, which inspection would have revealed the danger.

Subsection (b) provides that a product seller may be liable for its own representations if it is shown that claimant relied on an untrue representation.

Subsection (c) provides that a product seller will be strictly liable for defects arising in the product while under its control or under the control of a prior product seller other than a manufacturer.

Subsection (d) provides that a product seller may be liable if the manufacturer cannot be located or is probably not subject to process, or if the court determines that a judgment against the manufacturer will probably be unenforceable.

Subsection (e) provides that generally, any matter that must be established cannot be proved by showing the outcome of a previous lawsuit.

SECTION 7

This section provides the effect of government standards and contract specifications on liability.

Paragraph (1) of subsection (a) provides that if a product seller did not comply with mandatory state or federal government standards, the product will be considered unreasonably dangerous unless it is proved by clear and convincing evidence that such failure was reasonably prudent conduct under the circumstances.

Paragraph (2) of subsection (a) provides that if a product seller proves compliance with mandatory state or federal government standards, the product will not be considered unreasonably dangerous unless the claimant proves by clear and convincing evidence that such standards were unsound.

Subsection (b) provides that if a product seller proves compliance with mandatory government contract specifications, the product shall not be deemed unreasonably dangerous; and if claimant proves lack of compliance with such standards, the product shall be deemed unreasonably dangerous.

Subsection (c) provides that the principles set out in subparagraphs (a) and (b) are applicable to failures to warn or instruct.

If under this section a product is determined to be unreasonably dangerous, liability of the product seller will not ensue unless claimant establishes that the product was the proximate cause of the harm, and, in the case of a manufacturer, that it manufactured the product.

SECTION 8

This section provides that evidence of actions taken after the date of manufacture are not admissible as evidence, except to impeach a witness who denies the feasibility of precautionary measures.

SECTION 9

This section provides principles of comparative responsibility in the apportionment of damages. The trier of fact determines the total amount of damages claimant has sustained, and apportions this amount among all persons responsible (including claimant and non-parties). A de minimis rule excepts persons with trivial responsibility from apportionment.

This section also provides a special rule where workers' compensation is involved: In such case, the total damages to be apportioned are reduced by the greater of (1) the employer's or co-employer's responsibility; or (2) the amount of workers' compensation benefits.

Judgment is to be entered severally against all parties liable; upon subsequent motion of claimant, uncollected obligations may be reallocated among joint tortfeasors.

SECTION 10

This section provides the effect of workers' compensation benefits on liability. Damages otherwise recoverable in a products liability action are to be reduced by workers' compensation benefits. No subrogation, indemnity, contribution or lien may be had by an employer or its insurer against a product seller absent an agreement to the contrary. This section also contains a provision for adjusting damages where a products liability action is decided prior to adjudication of a workers' compensation claim.

Finally, no third-party action over against employer is permitted. However, the employer's (or co-employer's) responsibility will reduce the overall damage award in accordance with section 9.

This section provides rules concerning punitive damages. After a determination of the product seller's liability for actual damages and the amount thereof, on motion, the court may determine whether punitive damages should be awarded, and the amount thereof. Punitive damages shall be awarded only if a product seller acted with a flagrant indifference to consumer safety and if its actions were an extreme departure from accepted practice. In determining punitive damages, the court shall consider the likelihood that serious harm would arise; the extent of the product seller's awareness of such likelihood; the profitability of the misconduct; the duration of the misconduct and any concealment thereof; the attitude and conduct of the product seller's officers upon discovery of the misconduct; the financial condition of the product seller; the total effect of other punishment imposed on the product seller; and whether claimant acted in reckless disregard of his own safety.

Punitive damages for any one claimant shall not exceed twice the amount of actual damages and in no event shall exceed $1 million. With respect to all claimants, punitive damages and prior fines shall not exceed 5 percent of net worth. Notwithstanding this agregate limitation, a claimant shall always be able to recover the lesser of twice compensatory damages or his litigation expenses including reasonable attorneys fees.

This section provides time limits concerning the time in which an action must be brought.

Subsection (a) provides that a claim must be brought within three years of the time it was discovered or should have been discovered.

Subsections (b) to (d) provide a further limitation on the rule in subsection (a). All actions must be commenced within 10 years from the date the product was first sold. However, in the event that the manifestation of the harm is delayed, or in the event of intentional misrepresentation by a product seller, the action may be commenced within 15 years from the date of first sale. These time limitations may be extended by a product seller in writing.

SECTION 13

This section provides that if any provision of the Act is determined to be invalid, the remaining provisions of the Act shall be unaffected.

SECTION 14

This section provides that the Act shall be effective for actions commenced on or after January 1, 1983.

CHAIRMAN VOLCKER SHOULD RESIGN

(Mr. MOTTL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MOTTL. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a joint resolution calling for Federal Reserve Board Chairman Volcker to resign. I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this resolution.

This Nation has traveled the tight-money, high-interest road with Chairman Volcker to the bitter end. The end of the dream of homeownership for millions of American families. The end of auto industry employment for thousands of workers. The end of economic growth in this country.

I could quote figures, but we all know the figures. To cite just one statistic, the gross national product declined 5.2 percent in the last quarter, as our economy choked on high interest rates.

A victory over inflation will be hollow indeed if the price is the deliberate destruction of our industrial base. As one man put it in a letter to a Cleveland newspaper—and I quote:

Paul Volcker would be the kind of health commissioner who would shoot every flu victim in town and then declare the epidemic under control.

The Fed's experiment with extreme monetarism has failed. Mr. Volcker was the architect of that experiment. His resignation is imperative so that we might try to repair the damage and move realistically toward lower interest rates.

CONGRESSIONAL TAX BREAKS

(Mr. FINDLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, the last session of Congress, for all it did to try to set the Nation's economic house in order, took one action that upset its own economic house and weakened public confidence in the integrity of Congressmen. In a little noticed and obscure last minute legislative maneuver, the Senate tacked on an amendment concerning congressional tax breaks to a bill to fund black lung benefits, and sent the bill to the House where it was placed on the suspension calendar. When a bill is handled under suspension of the rules, it usually means that it is not controversial.

The black lung bill and two other matters unrelated to black lung benefits were not controversial. But the amendment tacked on to it by the Senate relating to tax benefits for Congressmen was extremely controversial.

The Senate amendment raised very substantially the limit on the automatic deduction that can be taken by a Member of Congress from $3,000 per year, which was established in 1954. Depending upon how many days Congress is in session during any year, that could mean a tax deduction of $15,000 to $20,000 for Senators and Congressmen.

In fact, the formula subsequently devised by IRS to calculate the number of days eligible for a $75 per day deduction permits the inclusion of all Mondays or Fridays the Congress is not in session so long as it is in session the other 3 days of the week. In other words, Congressmen could take a deduction even for days they were not working in Washington. In 1981, the House of Representatives was in session for 163 days, including strictly pro forma sessions. But under this IRS formula, Congressmen will be eligible to take a $75-a-day deduction for 262 days, giving them an additional tax break of $7,500 for days the House was not in session.

I think that is excessive and the way it was handled leaves the strong impression that it was designed to slip it through without most Congressmen or the American people knowing about it.

Today I am introducing legislation to repeal the tax break enacted for Congressmen last year and return to the standard established in 1954. Congressman BILL EMERSON is cosponsoring this bill with me.

Whether the bill passes or not, I will not claim the new tax deduction when I file my 1981 Federal income tax return, and, as in years past, I will make available to the news media my 1981 Federal income tax return.

A CONGRESSIONAL WHITE PAPER—HILTON HEAD BOARD OF REALTORS

(Mr. HARTNETT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. HARTNETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues a Congressional White Paper submitted by the Hilton Head Island, S.C. Board of Realtors. The paper addresses several issues which are important to the economic success of this area in South Carolina.

The Hilton Head Island Board of Realtors should be commended for their efforts and support for reducing the Federal budget deficit.

The white paper follows:

A CONGRESSIONAL WHITE PAPER HILTON HEAD ISLAND BOARD OF REALTORS

The Hilton Head Island Board of Realtors submits this Congressional White Paper to underline its support for certain issues which it feels are important to continued economic success in our area of the Lowcountry of South Carolina.

Interest rates in the United States are falling from their record highs of 1981. The Board supports the present fight to lower interest rates by the Federal Reserve Board, Congress, and the Administration. It is our hope that this battle continues to be won and that federal deficit borrowing can be kept to a minimum in 1982, thereby reducing the impact of government on the interest rate structure.

The Board also favors the continued support for Federal Flood Insurance for seashore oriented development as long as environmental considerations are given due weight. It is the Board's resolve that Federal Flood Insurance be given support by the Congress for future development in a tasteful and environmentally conscious manner and the federal funding for sea wall development and maintenance be continued at a high standard.

The development of the Lowcountry requires funding for water and sewer projects so the beautiful environment can be maintained. No county, city or town wishes to pollute a river, marsh or estuary, so continued federal funding for water and sewer projects is an integral part of economic health in this area.

The economic development of the Lowcountry is of concern because it provides a solid tax base, jobs and a healthy environment for people to live and work. A coordinated effort between federal, state and local government, business, industry and labor needs to be created to coordinate a hearty developmental future for the region. This will provide expert information and guidance from all sectors.

The economy of the United States is an important factor in the development of the area; therefore, a favorable tax structure geared to investment will help business develop in a manner from which all can prosper. Support for the Administration's stance on fighting inflation is an important factor to spur future economic development as well as active pursuit of the Economic Recovery Act of 1981. All of the above factors are important to get America working again.

The increased productivity of the American Work Force is a matter we feel requires active study and implementation at all levels of work in America. If we are to better our balance of trade and increase the health of the American Economy, Industrial Productivity will have to be increased. In addressing this matter a center for business, government and labor studies should be created to act as a consultant on issues that impact on these sectors individually and as a group. It is our feeling that such a center could be profit oriented after several years of existence and more than pay for itself. In conjunction with the above center and in-depth study of the American Economy supported by the Private and Public sector should be carried out, to among other considerations measure the effects of supply side economics on the economy and chart a path for future economic growth and stability.

The Board of Realtors wishes to work closely with the elected representatives of South Carolina and advocates a liaison between those officials and the Board.

This report is respectively submitted by the RPAC Representatives and the Hilton Head Island Board of Realtors.

JOHN RHODES SAYS FAREWELL

(Mr. RUDD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, by now the news that JOHN RHODES has decided to make this his last term in the House of Representatives has circulated throughout the Congress. For many of us, who have known JOHN and worked closely with him, this fact will take some getting used to. The special grace and dignity which he brought to these Halls will be sorely missed. Later on I will ask for a special order to pay tribute to JOHN RHODES for his monumental contribution to his country, his State, and his party.

John Kolbe, of the Phoenix Gazette has written a piece in which he sums up by saying, "John Rhodes has class." It is very simple, but in this case profoundly true. I wish to share this writer's insight with my colleagues:

[From the Phoenix Gazette, Jan. 25, 1982]

RHODES SAYS FAREWELL TO POLITICS WITH CHARACTERISTIC GRACE, SIMPLICITY

(By John Kolbe)

Now that John Rhodes has formally rung down the curtain on his remarkable political career, you might be excused for thinking he died.

The post-mortems will gush forth like so many obituaries.

Yet, it's precisely because they are not obituaries that makes his passing from the scene he has quietly dominated for three decades so unusual, and such an occasion for reflective joy.

He has set an example too seldom emulated by the Capitol Hill colleagues he is about to leave behind—he has recognized when his time was up, neatly severed the emotional bonds to the House he so loves, and embarked without tears on a new life while still at the peak of his mental powers and his capacity for making a contribution.

Whatever John Rhodes lacked in dash or charisma, he more than compensated with an intuitive sense of the limits of politics and personal ambition.

It might be argued he waited too long, that he should have stepped out when he shed his minority leadership mantle in 1980. That's quibbling over trifles. He may be excused for succumbing to the chance for one more stab at the speakership which forever eluded him.

Rhodes had been on the Hill long enough to see the Joe Martins and Charlie Hallecks and others wither away with the sunset of power until defeat or death overtook them, and he knew it was not for him.

By itself, that is a legacy sufficient to justify any career.

Which is not to suggest John Rhodes will leave behind nothing more enduring than the example of a graceful exit.

He will be remembered for many things, as should any man whose career of leadership has spanned a state's shedding of frontier innocence and coming of political and economic age.

Chief among them, which he himself proudly cites as his premier triumph, will be that big ditch coursing across the desert north of Phoenix—the long-dreamed Central Arizona Project, this state's lifeline to the future.

Nationally, he has cut a swath wider than any Arizonan in recent memory save Barry Goldwater and Mo Udall, chairing two Republican National Conventions (including 1976's tempestuous affair) with firmness and dignity, and assuming the GOP mantle of leadership in one of his party's darkest hours and helping restore its pride and define its governmental mission.

But, in candor, the Rhodes legislative achievements will never show up in the congressional record books, partly because he labored for 28 of his 30 years without the majority power essential to building such monuments.

John Rhodes' abiding legacy is less tangible than a stack of laws, but in the longer view of the nation's political rhythms, perhaps far more important.

He brought a steadiness, a quiet but unflagging confidence, to the conduct of the politician's craft. Every bill he wrote, argument he ameliorated, issue he debated or task he undertook, he touched with a consummate sense of decency.

And in that sense, he had become something of an anachronism, although he probably would never concede as much. Political style has undergone a sea-change since he arrived in Washington in 1952 as an Eisenhower-landslide freshman in the only Republican Congress he would ever serve, and that change—however inevitable with the shifting social tides—has not been an unqualified blessing.

Party discipline has been diluted. Freshman congressmen sound off before learning the way to the restroom. Government by press release is in vogue. Rhetorical combat has replaced pragmatic compromise. Tending constituent complaints supercedes guarding constitutional liberties.

It is no judgment on this new style to say, simply, that it's different, that it's not John Rhodes' style.

He seldom tugged at base emotions; a cerebral man, he appealed to more thoughtful instincts. His Arizona colleagues of three decades garnered far more headlines with their power, flamboyance or contentious ways. Where his compatriots were wild rapids and crashing cascades, Rhodes was old man river.

For us reporters, he was a bust, devoid of colorful lines, intimate revelations or angry tirades. John Rhodes never talked out of school. He was, in a word, boring, but ever so credible.

Because he valued the small step forward of accommodation more than the angry headline of failure, the young Turks in GOP ranks became restive. So he stepped down two years ago rather than face a divisive leadership battle.

It is a pattern he maintained unto the end.

He told his press conference he would do some writing, but "not an autobiography. That would be telling people how I want to be remembered, and they ought to decide that for themselves."

True to form, his decision was a well-kept secret to the end, and was accompanied by the usual gracious accolades to his wife, staff and newsmen.

It was also accompanied by prayers, he said, for "the wisdom to do my job well, and to leave the stage while the audience is asking for more. The time has come for me to do the latter."

For the friends and comrades of an adult lifetime, his decision came as no great shock. But even less surprising was the easy grace and straightforward simplicity with which he stepped aside.

John Rhodes, to use a word sadly cheapened by overuse, has class.

THERE'S NO LIBERTY WITHOUT LIFE

(Mr. PAUL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PAUL. Mr. Speaker, in July of 1979, a 3-pound infant was born in El Paso, Tex. The heart was beating, the baby breathed, and the newborn child made efforts to cry. Dr. Raymond Showery's abortion attempt was unsuccessful. The perverse use of his medical skills to destroy this life failed and the infant was born—alive. The doctor felt compelled to make up for his "malpractice" of delivering a live baby. A written report of the event said that Showery covered the baby's face, submerged it in liquid, and put it in a plastic bag. And the baby died.

A moment before it was legal to destroy this life; legally speaking, it was now a different matter, but hardly morally.

This life after birth, although its size and potential remained the same, no longer could be hidden inside the uterus and away from the eyes of the slayer, the assistants, and the law.

The courts were forced to consider this act of violence for now it was assumed, at least by some, that a child born deserves the protection of the law. An indictment was handed down on Friday, December 18, 1981, for murder.

What is it that made this life deserving of our concern at one moment yet not at another? What occured in that fleeting moment of birth that changed the value of this life?

And if nothing did change and even this new life deserves no protection, which newborn infants are protected from an early, violent death and which are not?

If on the same day that the doctor snuffed out that new life, the unborn child had suffered an injury in an auto accident, why is it he or she could have sued the guilty and the guilty would have been forced to compensate the injured?

Why is it, if on the same day if the father had died the unborn child would not have lost its rightful inheritance?

Why is it, if the unborn baby had suffered from medical malpractice on that day, if the child was injured by the doctor's ineptness, then the doctor could have been sued successfully and made to compensate the injured infant?

Why does any unborn of similar size and age have no right to life if someone chooses to sentence it to death, and yet have the right to legal protection if someone chooses that it shall live? Can our Nation survive with such a glaringly inconsistent legal code? Who are we, as protectors of life, liberty, and property, to have assumed this arbitrary power over human life? Do we qualify as executioners and grantors of kingly pardons? As our current law stands, that is how it seems.

What compels us to legally permit, encourage, and even pay for the destruction of human life? Mere size and the location of the life cannot be the only justifications. Could it not be that our respect for, and understanding of, life and liberty have been diminished? Have convenience and sensual pleasure now become superior to the moral law? And are certain lives expendable?

Is it only a concidence that the protection of personal and economic liberty suffered greatly even before we, as a Nation, rejected the legal protection of the unborn?

Respect for life and respect for liberty are one one in the same. To lose one is to lose the other, and if we continue to disregard both, our free society will be destroyed. We cannot remain callous toward human life, regardless of size.

MEMBERS OF CONGRESS SHOULD NOT RECEIVE TAX BENEFITS

(Mrs. BOUQUARD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BOUQUARD. Mr. Speaker, I firmly believe that Members of Congress should not receive any tax benefits or treatment that varies with what other taxpayers must accept. We should be able to claim those expenses which we can document and which the Internal Revenue Service would accept as legitimate costs incurred as a result of our employment. We expected that the Secretary of the Treasury, because he has responsibility for the Government's revenue, might be parsimonious in his treatment of Members' tax benefits. We were, needless to say, disappointed in this hope.

I have no objection to providing in law that a Member of Congress receive the same benefits and treatment from the IRS as do all other taxpayers, and I am today introducing legislation to repeal this deduction.

We cannot condone either this extraordinary generosity of the Treasury in this matter, nor the dubious tactics that prevented the issue from being clearly defined and debated.

INTEREST RATES—CAN WE AFFORD THEM?

(Mr. ANTHONY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, interest rates—can we afford them?

On October 6, 1979, the Federal Reserve adopted a monetarist viewpoint. Ever since interest rates have gyrated up and down, but basically up. As a result, we know that the automobile industry has been slapped with its worst performance in two decades and the housing industry has literally been in a depression for several months.

The economy cannot recover and produce sustained growth with the current level of interest rates, continued high interest rates or worse yet, a rebound in interest rates would surely transfer the recessionary economy into a depression. Interest rates will fall in the depression along with everybody and everything.

The danger is clear and present. The risk we run is that the Fed's monetarist policy will slide us into a depression. With its zeal for tight money, the Fed actually operated at the low end of its target for 1981.

The consequence of a depression is structural damage to the economy. The housing and auto industries and other business bankruptcies would slow any future growth because so many people would be out of business.

The time to act is now, Mr. Speaker. The answer is clear. We cannot afford high interest rates.

EL SALVADOR

(Mr. WEISS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, the Reagan administration quietly has dragged the United States further into El Salvador's civil conflict, making the prospects for peace there increasingly dim. Without fanfare the administration brought the first of 1,600 Salvadoran soldiers to Fort Bragg, N.C., earlier this month for training. This will cost American taxpayers $18 million above the $26 million already authorized for military aid to El Salvador.

This large-scale training program signals a warning from the administration that the Salvadoran conflict will not be ended soon. The ongoing conflict already had overwhelmed the hope that elections planned for March in El Salvador would be open and fair, and no real effort has yet been made by the junta or by the Reagan administration to open negotiations with rebel forces.

At the same time, fighting in El Salvador shows signs of spilling over into neighboring countries. Cooperation between Honduran and Guatemalan forces and the El Salvadoran military in fighting opposition forces is prompting this regionalization of the war. Meanwhile, Government repression in Guatemala may well spark widespread rebellion there similar to the fighting in El Salvador.

The very plain fact of the matter is that no amount of military involvement by the United States will help bring a halt to this tragic conflict. The roots of the unrest are founded in 50 years of injustice and repression. Military aid to El Salvador should be stopped now.

CONGRESSMAN SAVAGE INTRODUCES BILL TO ASSIST TEMPORARY MORTGAGE ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

(Mr. SAVAGE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which I believe will provide relief for persons who are out of work and cannot make mortgage payments on loans insured by the Department of Housing and Urban Development. The bill would prohibit foreclosure for up to 36 months.

Although Congress passed legislation in 1980 when it enacted the Housing and Community Development Act to set up a temporary mortgage assistance program, otherwise known as TMAP, funds have not been appropriated to implement this program.

With so many people out of work, like many of the laid-off Wisconsin steelworkers and residents of the Roseland community in my district, for example, many families may lose their homes, because finding new jobs or retraining takes time and that does not stop the bills from coming in.

In my opinion, this is just another example of the insensitivity of the Reagan administration toward the working poor and middle-class citizens of this country.

My bill would help to get this program off dead center. So I urge my colleagues to lend their support.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE SPEAKER TO THE COMMITTEE ON ENERGY AND COMMERCE

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MOAKLEY) laid before the House the following communication from the Speaker of the House of Representatives to the Committee on Energy and Commerce.

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
January 22, 1982.

Hon. JOHN D. DINGELL,
Chairman, Committee on Energy and Commerce, Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I have received your letter of January 21, 1982 notifying me, pursuant to Rule L (50) of the Rules of the House, of your recent receipt of a subpoena ad testificandum in William P. Tavoulareas, et al. v. Philip Piro and William P. Tavoulareas, et al. v. The Washington Post Co., et al., Civil Action Action Nos. 80-2387 and 80-3032. I agree with you that this subpoena appears to raise serious questions concerning the rights and privileges of the House of Representatives.

It has been my policy, under House Rule L (50) and its predecessor, House Resolution 722, to consult with the bi-partisan leadership of the House of Representatives. The serious questions raised by a subpoena of this nature lead me to instruct you, pursuant to the power vested in me by paragraph six (6) of Rule L (50), to refrain from either effecting compliance or seeking judicial guidance until the leadership of the House has had a reasonable opportunity to receive and review the determinations to be made pursuant to paragraph three (3) of Rule L (50).

Sincerely,

THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

SIXTY-FOURTH ANNIVERSARY OF UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE, JANUARY 22, 1982

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BARNARD). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, January 22 of this year marked the 64th anniversary of the independence of the Ukraine. As we have done regularly for many years, Members of the House have participated in special orders to salute this important anniversary date, to express the hope for a speedy return of the independence of the Ukraine, and to salute, encourage, and commend those Americans of Ukrainian descent.

Of course, as we are aware, the House was not in session on January 22, because of the recess marking the end of the 1st session of the 97th Congress, and so the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) and I selected today instead to render our comments and observations on this important anniversary.

The Ukraine is one of the most important of the Captive Nations whose plight Congress annually commemorates in July pursuant to a resolution adopted more than 20 years ago. It is unfortunate that because the independence of the Ukraine lasted but a short time, between the fall of the Czar and the military takeover of the Ukraine by the Bolshevik government under Lenin, some people tend to forget that the Ukraine was indeed at one time free. For 5 years the Ukraine had a separate political identity of its own, even though since 1918 it has been incorporated into territory of the U.S.S.R.

The Baltic States of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania are also incorporated within the territory of the Soviet Union. But their independence, which was established as part of the treaty which took Russia out of World War I, continued until the Soviet counterattack against the Nazi forces in World War II, some 22 years later.

The Ukraine has had a long and distinguished history, with geographic and ethnic identities of its own. Of special importance has been the Ukraine's excellent agricultural production. For centuries it has, therefore, been the target for the aggression on the part of whatever European power might believe itself at the moment to be in the ascendance—by Poland, by Sweden, by Prussia, by Germany, and of course by the Bolsheviks. Yet throughout all of these invasions and occupations, including the current one, the people of the Ukraine have maintained their fierce love of freedom, their bold sense of independence, and their individual integrity.

When our House Armed Services Committee was in the Ukraine in 1978 during a trip to the U.S.S.R., it was perfectly obvious to all of us on the trip that, although politically a part of the Soviet Union, the Ukrainian people were a very special breed—more open, more friendly, and much more insistent on their own special identity. Not even the harsh controls employed by the Soviet KGB could impose the kind of cautious hesitation upon Ukrainians that one encountered on the part of citizens in other parts of the U.S.S.R. We are now seeing similar courage, tenacity, and integrity among the Polish people and Solidarity during these last 2 difficult years in Poland.

Fortunately, Mr. Speaker, the oppression which the Soviet masters have imposed on the people of the Ukraine has had a strong, positive impact on these United States. We have been most fortunate in inheriting the drive, the skills, and the rugged independence of those Ukrainians who could no longer put up with life without the freedom. As a result, hundreds of thousands of Americans of Ukrainian descent have made extremely valuable contributions to the growth and development of the United States; and their children and their children's children have continued those great contributions.

We salute these brave Ukrainian American people in this anniversary year, and we honor them for their achievements.

At the same time, Mr. Speaker, we must not forget the plight of the people still living in the Ukraine. Their leaders and their patriots have already been jailed or exiled—as is being done today in Poland—for no other crime than sincerely seeking the freedom and independence to live their own lives, a right that should be the heritage of every human being: Nykola Rudenko, for example, whose fate we sought unsuccessfully to ameliorate when our committee visited the Ukraine in 1978.

Although the hope and optimism we held out for Poland has been dimmed by the recent imposition of martial law by the Communist Polish Government, under fire from Moscow, the story there is not yet over. We surely hope that the impressive achievements of Solidarity, and their apparent ability to negotiate some measure of freedom with the Soviets, can eventually come true in the Ukraine and in other parts of the Captive Nations' gulag in the years ahead.

This is not just a rhetorical statement, Mr. Speaker. Who could have thought just a few years ago that what has been happening in Poland could have ever happened behind the Iron Curtain? If it can happen in Poland, it can certainly happen in the Ukraine, and elsewhere.

So on this 64th anniversary of the brief but brilliant freedom of the Ukraine, let us simply make this prayer—"God speed the day when this sunshine of freedom shall indeed come again to the Ukraine."

[From the News World, Jan. 13, 1982]

CAPTIVE UKRAINE TEACHES US THE DEPTH OF SOVIET BRUTALITY

(By Bui Anh Tuan)

On Jan. 22, Ukrainians all over the Free World will celebrate the 64th anniversary of their country's proclamation of independence. The struggle of Solidarity adds more purport to that commemoration: Like Poland, Ukraine once enjoyed full sovereignty, and like Poland, Ukraine is being held captive behind the Iron Curtain.

From Ukraine to Poland, the Soviets have not changed their modus operandi. In the latter, they silenced the cries for freedom by means of local communist puppets who call themselves martial law authorities, while in the former they used a tiny group of Ukrainian traitors to cover up their military aggression of 1920, designed to destroy the Ukrainian National Republic and to create an illegal government known as the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, U.S.S.R.

And what makes these facts more memorable is that Western democrats—in Europe as well as in America—who gave no quarter to the two notorious World War II puppets of Nazi Germany (Norway's Vidkun Quisling and France's Pierre Laval) have put up with—even aided—the cruel puppets of the Soviet Union in Ukraine, Poland and in other parts of the world.

MILLIONS ANNIHILATED

The 64th commemoration of Ukrainian independence is a new opportunity for Americans to remember that the Soviet Union is the only remaining colonial empire, and that its leaders are many times more brutal than those of czarist Russia, which they overthrew in the name of human liberty and antiimperialism. During six decades of communist rule, millions of Ukrainians have been annihilated through deportations, executions and man-made famines.

In addition, both the Ukrainian Orthodox Church and Ukrainian Catholic Church have been obliterated, along with their clergy, prompting conservative members of Congress to introduce Resolution 123, exposing that form of Soviet "genocide" and seeking resurrection of these national churches to 50 million Ukrainians.

The Ukraine is proof of the intrinsic deviousness of communism. Ukrainian independence was recognized by a large number of nations, including Soviet Russia. But their solemn pledge has not prevented the Russian Bolsheviks from invading Ukraine and turning it into a colony.

More painful is the fact that Western nations, particularly France and England which were among the early recognizers of Ukrainian independence, comfortably sat tight as a numerically and technically superior Russian army made mincemeat of Ukrainian resistance. Without Western assistance, Ukraine valiantly fought the communist invaders for 3½ years. History would have taken a different turn if Western liberalism had been more sympathetic to the aspirations of free Ukraine.

WON'T STOP FIGHTING

Despite Soviet oppression and Western liberal abandonment, Ukrainians continue the fight. Ukraine represents 20 percent of the population in the Soviet Union, but some 45 percent of political prisoners in all Soviet gulags come from Ukraine. On Nov. 9, 1976, the Ukrainian Helsinki Group was formed. Three months later, its leader was arrested. Now, not a single active member of the monitoring group is around—23 behind bars, six exiled overseas, one driven to suicide and two under KGB surveillance after completing their jail terms for their quest for freedom.

The ruthlessness of Soviet leaders has no limits. Chornovil, a journalist-Helsinki activist, was framed for "attempted rape." A woman was sentenced to 10 years of imprisonment for receiving uncensored letters from her husband. Age also, breeds no immunity—five years of internal exile plus six months in a psychiatric hospital for a 76-year-old frail woman; and 10 years in jail for Shukhevych, then a 14-year-old boy. If Shukhevych is released in 1987 at the end of his present jail term, he will have spent 35 years in prison.

IGNORED BY MEDIA

Just a very few in this country know about the fate of Mykola Rudenko, the Ukrainian Helsinki leader, and his courageous wife Raisa. Both are now in jail. The Rudenkos oppose Soviet imperialism, but our major media is not interested in them. By contrast, the South Korean Kim Dae Jung, who does not oppose Soviet imperialism, has almost become a household name in America.

Of 32 members of the Ukrainian Helsinki group, 10 are journalists, writers and poets. Our major media simply ignore their struggle and ordeal. But no fewer than 1,000 members of our news organizations, including those from The New York Times and The Washington Post, have signed an "open letter on violence against journalists in El Salvador," heaping blame on the moderate pro-U.S. government of President Napolean Duarte!

UKRAINIAN CONGRESS COMMITTEE OF AMERICA, INC.,
New York, N.Y., January 18, 1982.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE: The Polish crisis has once again demanded a re-thinking by all free men about the Soviet Russians, the USSR, and all the captive non-Russian nations from the Danube to the Urals. Both in the short and long run it would be the height of naivete to believe this crisis is exclusively a Polish one. To commence such a reassessment in this new year, a no more appropriate occasion presents itself than the observance of the 64th Anniversary of the Independence of Ukraine. It's a good time for some integrative thought.

Like Poland, Ukraine (the largest non-Russian nation of 50 million both in the USSR and Eastern Europe) fell under Soviet Russian domination two decades earlier. The independent Ukrainian National Republic, established on January 22, 1918 following the collapse of the Tsarist Russian Empire, was one of the first victims of Soviet Russian imperialism, which in a long series of conquests stalks today in Afghanistan. Like Poland's, the history of Ukraine's resistance to a more immediate Soviet Russian rule has been a long and heroic one. A vital point overlooked in current discussion is Moscow's deep fear of Solidarity's overspill into the Baltic states and Ukraine. For strikes and workers' demands for free unionism have also emerged in Estonia, Ukraine, and federated Russia. As scholars in the field maintain, had Ukraine remained free, Poland and others would not be unfree.

Your address on this fundamental subject in the Congress during the week of January 25 will not go unheard. I urge you to stimulate this re-thinking process so that new and more realistic approaches toward an irrepressible enemy could be developed. VOA, RL and FRE, as well as other media, will transmit your message to these critical areas of Eastern Europe. I also urge your support of (1) the resolutions now pending before the House Foreign Affairs Committee (the Senate has already passed the Goldwater measure) seeking the resurrection of the Stalin-genocided Ukrainian Orthodox and Catholic churches in Ukraine and (2) full, informative hearings on the non-Russian nations in the USSR. The President's excellent address on the Polish crisis provides the tone for such action.

In the House, under formal order, the Honorable Samuel S. Stratton and Edward J. Derwinski will lead the discussive observance. In the Senate, we hope for a productive colloquy, and a reception will be sponsored by the Honorable Alfonse M. D'Amato and Christopher J. Dodd. The respective offices will have dates, place and time when Congress reconvenes.

With much gratitude for your participation and best wishes in the New Year.

Sincerely,

LEV. E. DOBRIANSKY,
UCCA President,
Georgetown University.

□ 1230

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I am very happy to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BIAGGI. I want to thank the gentleman for yielding and take this opportunity to commend him for his leadership, together with the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) whose efforts in this area have been unflagging. It is this type of manifestation of continued concern that gives hope to those who are enslaved in the Ukraine and other nations in the captive nations bloc.

On the note that the gentleman is stressing, when he so graciously yielded to me, when he equated the Ukraine and the recent conduct in Poland, it clearly demonstrates that the spirit of freedom that is in the bosom of all mankind can never be finally and irrepressibly suppressed. It must one day burst forth, and I am sure it will. Hopefully, one day the yoke of tyranny will be shed, and those in the Ukraine and all of those who are now subjugated by the Soviet Union, and to their oppressive methods, will be free. It is only because of that spirit and because of the continued interest of people like the gentleman in the well, Mr. DERWINSKI, and our colleagues in both Houses, and the community at large, that functions on a day-to-day basis. Even though small in their numbers, their abundance of spirit crosses the ocean to continue to fire the light of hope in the breast of all of those that we are so concerned about.

Mr. STRATTON. I thank the gentleman from New York (Mr. BIAGGI), for his always eloquent and very pertinent remarks.

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from New York (Mr. PEYSER).

Mr. PEYSER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I, too, want to join in congratulating the gentleman for not only taking this time but for the remarks that he has made concerning the Ukrainians' independence.

I would like to mention briefly at this time that over the recess I have become very personally involved in a situation dealing with a 14-year-old Ukrainian boy who has in our country here struck out for freedom. The young man's name is Walter Polovchak. It is a very familiar name in this country today because of the great controversy that has been raging over this young man between the Soviet Union and the United States.

I had the opportunity of going to Chicago and visiting with this young boy for some time before I decided that it was in our best interests here in the United States and in the boy's best interests to obtain an order through the Justice Department that would guarantee his right to stay in this country until such time as all legal processes had been explored, and so he would not be forced to return. I thought on this day and on this anniversary it would be of particular interest to hear a letter that I received this morning from this young man, written to me. I have excerpted the letter because there were some statements of a highly personal nature that I did not feel related to the situation, but I felt that I would like to read very briefly what Walter had to say. I would like to say before that, that this is a decent, nice young man who for the first time in his life has tasted freedom here, and does not want to be returned to the repression that he lived in for 12 years before coming here. This is what Walter had to say:

EXCERPTS FROM LETTER RECEIVED ON JANUARY 26, 1982

Dear Congressman Peyser: I decided to write you a letter. I would like to tell you why I want to stay in this country. I like the freedom. I like the people and country. I can practice my religion here. I don't want to go back because if I go they will put me in jail or to a mental house. I don't like the way the teachers were hitting children. We had to go to school on Christmas and wash the desks and clean the walls. In summer, not school time, we had to go and work in the fields.

I don't like to belong to the Communist organization called pioneers. The people are not free. They can't say what they want to say. I couldn't practice my religion. I couldn't go to church because if I go the teachers were standing in front of the church and next day you go to school and you get in trouble. I couldn't go to another city or state. The police had to know where you were going to live in the city. You had to sign out. You couldn't buy food in a store. You had to know someone that works in the store to buy some food.

I was raised by my grandmother until I was 12 years old. When we were in Italy on the way to America, my father told me that I could go and live in California with my aunt. Then, about 6 months later, my father told me that he is going back to the Soviet Union. I said that I don't want to go back, and he said he will pay $100 to the police to put me on the plane and send me back. I got scared and I ran away from home.

On this, I am ending my letter. Please write me if you want to know more.

WALTER POLOVCHAK.

Mr. PEYSER. Now, you can picture the strain that this 14-year-old is under and has been under in making the decision he has made. But I think he has exemplified the best tradition of freedom that exists among Ukrainian people, and given the opportunity to express that freedom as he has, I think they would express it the same way.

I think it is very much up to us in the United States, and if need be in the Congress itself, to guarantee that this young boy is going to have a chance to grow up in the United States and enjoy this freedom.

I thank the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON) for yielding to me.

Mr. STRATTON. Let me commend the gentleman from New York for reading that letter into the RECORD. I think that is a very eloquent and unusual letter.

As I understand the gentleman this is one that has not been made public. It certainly indicates that this boy of 14, whom some in the press are trying to portray as just a kid, has a perception of the ideas of freedom far beyond his years, and I would think that that would be a very eloquent piece of evidence in behalf of his plea to be allowed to remain here.

Mr. PEYSER. The gentleman is correct. This has not been released until just now.

Mr. STRATTON. I want to also commend the gentleman for his interest in this matter. As he said, he went to Chicago to visit the young man. One of our leading newspapers in New York State, I noticed, undertook to chastise the gentleman from New York for going out there and interesting himself in this particular case. That is strange, because I thought the New York Times stood for freedom, the way the rest of us do. But I think what the gentleman has come up with is a very valuable piece of evidence, and I would share his view that if the executive branch should weaken—although I do not believe it will—in allowing him to remain here, we in the Congress ought to certainly provide the last refuge and allow him to continue here. It certainly demonstrates that the Ukrainian people, as I was just saying, have a special premature, perhaps, sense of freedom which is demonstrated by this young man, and by his older sister, I understand, who also decided to choose freedom. She was 3 or 4 years older, but nobody seems to be terribly upset by the fact that she stayed here.

Mr. PEYSER. If the gentleman would yield on that point, the gentleman is very correct. The sister, whose name is Natalie, recently spent a weekend in my home in New York, and she is a delightful young woman who has really, I say, grabbed with both hands the essence of American freedom. And the reason no issue is being made over her is that she was old enough to enter the country on her own passport and, therefore, she was free of any other obligations, and she has chosen to remain and is going on, I am sure, to an outstanding career in this country.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I am pleased to have the gentleman participate in this special order, and I yield to the gentleman from Illinois for that purpose.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with my colleague, Congressman SAM STRATTON, in cosponsoring this special order in honor of the 64th anniversary of the independence of the Republic of Ukraine.

As we commemorate this anniversary, it is necessary to remember that the Soviet Union continues to suppress the nationalistic spirit of the non-Russian Republics within the U.S.S.R. As we look at the plight of the people of the Ukraine, the largest non-Russian country in Eastern Europe being held captive by the Soviets, it is important to note that the date of January 22 remains a symbol of a period when human dignity, national freedom, and self-determination were gained.

Sixty-four years ago, the Ukraine was able to break away from the czarist regime of Russia and declare its freedom and self-determination. On that day in 1918, the proclamation of independence of the Ukrainian National Republic was issued in the city of Kiev, which became the capital city of the Ukraine.

However, after 2 years of this nation's existence, Russian control was once again restored by the forced incorporation of the Ukraine into the Soviet Socialist Republics, and it remains today under the black hand of Soviet oppression.

This domination has not dampened the spirits of the Ukrainian people as they continue their ongoing struggle to preserve their cultural and traditional beliefs that have been so vital to their existence. The Ukrainian people have strong traditions, a distinct language and literature, and deep religious convictions of their own.

Since the time of the Russian Communist takeover, the Ukrainian people have not given up hope of once more regaining the freedom which they knew so briefly. Their constant efforts are proof of the inability of the Kremlin rulers to break the noble Ukrainian nationalistic spirit.

The tenacity of their dissident nationalistic movement has never died. Despite the extreme pressure tactics employed by the Soviet Union on the Ukrainian people, dissenters continue to speak out against the cruel Soviet tyranny.

The determination of its people to retain their cultural and intellectual freedom still grows.

One of the most dramatic and encouraging factors in the ongoing struggle between freedom and tyranny is the continuing growth of this nationalistic spirit among the non-Russian peoples within the U.S.S.R. This is especially significant when we keep in mind that the Communist dictatorship in the Kremlin has failed in their efforts to eradicate the nationalism of the Ukrainian people.

Not only is the Ukraine the largest nation territorially in Eastern Europe and the U.S.S.R., it has the largest nationality group within the Soviet bloc. It is also the richest in resources of the captive nations, possessing tremendous agricultural lands, which once earned for it the title of the "Breadbasket of Europe," as well as possessing an abundance of industrial assets.

Today, as we commemorate the 64th anniversary of the strong and determined peoples of the Ukraine, we must not forget the struggle of the oppressed nations held captive by Soviet rule, and continue to offer hope and our full and uncompromising support in their aspirations for freedom and self-determination. We must help to make their shattered dreams and those of all captive peoples reality once again.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his remarks. I have only tried modestly to follow in the footsteps of the great leadership that the gentleman from Illinois has provided.

● Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commemorate the 64th anniversary of the Proclamation of Independence of the Ukrainian National Republic.

On this date in 1918, the brave and determined people of this country celebrated what they believed to be the end of many years of repression by the more powerful countries which surrounded them. Unfortunately, in the early stages of World War II, the Soviet Union abruptly put an end to the short-lived freedom Ukrainians had enjoyed by a forceable Soviet occupation and takeover of that region. Thousands of Ukrainians lost their lives and homes as a result of this cruel and unjust action by the Soviets. The most significant loss, however, was the denial of freedom which the Ukrainian people had fought so hard to obtain.

Mr. Speaker, I consider myself most fortunate to live in a country that entitles me to freedom and independence. I cherish these privileges more than anything. I volunteered for the service in World War II because I believed so strongly that these essential rights should and must be protected. My heart goes out to the people of the Ukraine. I realize the agony that these freedom-loving people must be experiencing. Therefore, I believe it to be the obligation of this Congress to not only condemn the oppression that still plagues the people of the Ukraine, but to also support and encourage their struggle to regain their freedom. I am proud to stand with my colleagues in honoring this important date and also in our commitment to the people of the Ukraine.●

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, January 26 marks the 64th anniversary of the Proclamation of Independence of the Ukraine National Republic. On this occasion we join with Ukrainians throughout the world in commemorating this event. As much as any people today, Ukrainians understand and cherish the value of freedom, if only because for much of their history, freedom has been denied to them. They have paid a price for wanting independence. They have suffered under both Communist and Nazi oppression. They continue to strive for liberty today even as the Soviet Red Army seeks to crush any vestige of dissent, much less independence.

Because we are all one people on this planet, and because our own freedom is jeopardized by the persecution of freedom-loving people anywhere, our hearts and prayers go out to the Ukrainian people as they continue to struggle against totalitarianism.

May their quest for freedom be successful, and may history record that even during their darkest hours, their cause was not forgotten by the world.●

● Mr. DOUGHERTY. Mr. Speaker, it was 64 years ago last week that a nation was born. More correctly, a nation was reborn that year, for the people of Ukraine had enjoyed independence throughout their history. On January 22, 1918, the Ukrainian Central Rada, the legal government, proclaimed the Ukraine to be an independent state. The next year found more territories eager to join the new Ukraine. The hopes and visions of the Ukrainian people were never stronger than at that promising period of 1918 to 1920.

As we all know, the Soviet Russians have never been accused of respecting the hopes and visions of any independent state. In 1920, they moved into Ukraine and took control.

Because we have seen the Russians invade nations in the 1980's, we tend to downplay such occurrences in the 1920's. Mr. Speaker, that kind of attitude is totally wrong. The fact that these Ukrainians have been denied their rightful independence for 64 years in fact increases the magnitude of this terrible injustice. We must become more vocal in our outrage at this foul deed. We must not be silent or tolerant. We must be as forceful now as we would if the Soviets had just moved into Ukraine yesterday.

As the Soviet Government has no doubt learned, the passage of time has only strengthened the resolve of those committed to seeing an independent Ukraine once again. The U.S. Congress will take this opportunity every year to remind the Soviet Government of their responsibility to respect human rights. Let me assure you, Mr. Speaker, as cochairman of the Ad Hoc Congressional Committee on the Baltic States and Ukraine, that the struggle for Ukrainian human rights will continue throughout 1982. The Soviets can best respect human rights in this case by acknowledging, 64 years too late, the legitimate independence of Ukraine.●

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank Congressman DERWINSKI and Congressman STRATTON for arranging this special order in commemoration of the 64th anniversary of the Proclamation of Independence of the Ukraine National Republic.

I was greatly honored last year at this time to be named "Man of the Year" by the Illinois division of the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America—a distinction of which I am very proud.

When we speak of the Captive Nations struggling under communist slavery, there is no exaggeration in stating that the Ukraine has suffered the longest.

The record of Russia's inhuman treatment and persecution in Ukraine is probably matchless in the history of mankind. Since 1920, Ukraine has endured persecution, mass murders amounting to genocide, religious and national persecution and economic exploitation. To this day, Moscow continues its relentless policy of the Russification of Ukraine.

And yet, the tradition of Ukrainian independence—a tradition that goes back centuries—cannot be destroyed. A spirit of freedom lives on in the hearts of those who must endure Soviet threats, persecution, cultural and political manipulation, propaganda, discrimination and suppression. Despite this, the Ukraine people continue to fight daily for their human rights and national independence.

As we reflect on their ordeal today, we must also recognize and pay tribute to the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America which, since 1940, has been a powerful advocate of independence for Ukraine. I know my colleagues join me in congratulating the committee for its zeal and dedication in continuing the struggle for freedom in the Ukraine, and for serving as the voice of so many in this captive nation who cannot speak for themselves.●

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, January 22 marked the 64th anniversary of Ukrainian independence. In 1918 a Ukrainian Republic was established on that day, as the Czarist Empire was disintegrating in the wake of its defeat in World War I. The new republic marked the end of centuries of cruel exploitation of the Ukraine by Russia.

The new state was recognized almost immediately by many other nations of the world. On February 9, 1918, the Ukraine signed a peace treaty with Germany, Austria-Hungary, Turkey, and Bulgaria. Shortly afterward, France and Great Britain accorded the young republic de facto recognition.

Tragically, the new Soviet regime to the Ukraine's north did not share in the spirit of self-determination characteristic of the era and launched an invasion after the establishment of the state. A brutal struggle ensued, in which the Ukraine fought alongside the newly independent Polish Republic against their common Bolshevik foe. During the war, Kiev, the Ukrainian capital, changed hands several times and eventually the Soviets emerged victorious. The Treaty of Riga, signed by Russia and Poland in March 1921, marked the end of Ukrainian independence and a return of foreign domination over the proud and courageous Ukrainian people.

Soviet rule proved even harsher than Czarist oppression. Ukrainian language and culture have been relegated to a secondary status as the Soviet regime has attempted to absorb the Ukrainian people into the Russian nation. In 1932, collectivization stripped Ukrainian farmers of their land—so fertile the area is known as "the breadbasket of Europe"—and produced a famine that led to 7 million deaths. That same decade also witnessed the brutal liquidation of the Ukrainian Orthodox and Catholic Churches. Imposition of Russian culture on the Ukrainian people continues at the present time.

In light of these tragic events, Ukrainian Independence Day remains a bittersweet celebration for the 50 million Ukrainians in their homeland and the 2 million Ukrainian-Americans who enjoy true freedom in our country today. I know my colleagues join me in fervently wishing that the 50 million Ukrainians now within the boundaries of the U.S.S.R. could enjoy a similar degree of freedom as their compatriots in this country do.●

● Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, it is more important than ever that we commemorate and stand strong behind the Ukrainians as they commemorate January 22 as the 64th anniversary of their Declaration of Independence and Self-Determination.

This day gives us time to reflect and appreciate the freedom that exists in America today. Currently, since the Soviet Union places more pressure on the free wills of the people living behind the Iron Curtain, we must show our support for the continuous struggle that the people of the Ukraine have endured since the granting of their independence in 1918.

The Ukrainians are people who should be applauded for their ongoing resistance to the Soviet subjugation. The Ukrainians continue striving to preserve the cultural and traditional beliefs of their own distinct history. They continue to fight for freedom and national identity, no matter what the cost.

It is hard not to think of the struggle and stress that the Polish people are now experiencing. Situations like the Polish question which is now at the forefront of public attention have existed in the Ukraine for the last 64 years. No one can possibly imagine what it is like to live under a situation like the one that exists in the Ukraine and Poland today. Moscow continues its imperialistic Russification policies, while breaking promises to its satellites as well as to other Western nations.

I cannot more strongly state that we have an obligation to display to the people of the Ukraine that they have an ally. They need to know that we as Americans continue to remember and support their struggle for basic human liberties and rights. Let us remember our basic liberties, such as freedom of the press, speech, travel, and to vote. And, let us never forget that this day is only one reminder that the people of the Ukraine struggle every day of the year to gain just some of the basic inalienable rights that exist in the free world.●

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, January 26, 1982, marks the 64th anniversary of independence for the people of the sovereign state of the Ukrainian Republic. I'm pleased to be part of this memorable occasion which commemorates a most significant event. As a nation of people who enjoy personal liberty, we should not be complacent about the greatness of our country or the many freedoms it offers us. The people of the Ukraine are continuing their struggle to secure the rights and freedoms that we as a nation fought for and won over 200 years ago. We should join together in saluting the Ukrainians to demonstrate that they are not forgotten by those of us who cherish the freedoms of a free society. Always standing proudly, the people of the Ukrainian Republic have courageously battled continuous Soviet domination. The Ukraine, which is the largest non-Russian nation within the U.S.S.R. and all of Eastern Europe, has a very strong and commendable record of opposition to the aggressive imperialism of the Soviet Union. The Ukrainian Congress Committee of America, Inc., serves an admirable function by drawing attention to the plight of those who live through this terrible ordeal.

The Ukrainian spirit remains undaunted and strong despite the adverse conditions these people valiantly struggle against. The Ukrainian people continue to nurture a flickering flame of freedom that cannot be snuffed out by acts of Soviet imperialism. On the 64th anniversary of their independence, they truly deserve our unending support for their courage and constancy.●

● Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Speaker, Russian imperialism is nothing new to the people of the Ukraine, who have been struggling for independence for centuries. The evidence of the marvelous spirit of the Ukrainian people is that they have managed to retain their ethnic and cultural identity and continue to pursue their quest for freedom and independence.

We should not forget that the Soviet Union consists of many captive nations oppressed by Russian imperialism, but the Ukraine is the largest and potentially the most troublesome for the Kremlin.

Today we commemorate the Ukrainian declaration of independence 64 years ago, but this liberation lasted only 3 years until Russian domination returned.

The hope for freedom survives today in the Ukraine, and we should join our hopes and prayers with their aspirations, even as we support the movement for freedom in Poland and applaud the courageous resistance of the Afghan people against the Soviet invasion.●

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, our observance his week of the 64th anniversary of the Ukrainian Independence Day takes on special meaning in the light of the current plight being suffered by the people of Poland.

The Ukrainian people, once members of a free and proud nation themselves, clearly understand the true meaning and likely consequences of the military rule in Poland. Ukrainians, and all other freedom loving people around the world, are well aware the oppression taking place in Poland has been carefully orchestrated by the Soviet Union.

Like Poland, the Ukraine was also a free nation. January 22, 1918, was a day of glory for Ukrainians when their free and democratic Parliament, the Rada, declared the nation's independence. But freedom for the Ukrainian National Republic was seen as a serious threat by the Communist forces that had taken control of Russia during the revolution of 1917. Finally, in 1922, the Communists forcibly took over the Ukraine and began a brutal repressive campaign against the Ukrainian people that continues today.

Mr. Speaker, literally millions of Ukrainians have been systematically slaughtered by a succession of Russian Communist regimes. Ukrainians have been forced over the past 64 years to leave their homeland and serve their Russian slavemasters in factories and on farms throughout the Soviet Union.

Despite all this turmoil and tragedy, the Ukrainians living in the Soviet Union have somehow managed against great odds to maintain both their dignity and their ethnic identity. There is no question that while Russian control over the Ukraine is brutal and complete, the spirit of the Ukrainian people has never been diminished.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to have sponsored a House resolution declaring that it be the sense of Congress that the President of the United States shall take steps to secure freedom of worship in the Ukraine and bring to the attention of national and international religious councils Soviet violations of basic human rights. It is my utmost hope this effort will lead to the resurrection of the Ukrainian Orthodox and Catholic Churches that were destroyed during the Stalin era.

The brave people of the Ukraine have served as an inspiration for Poland during this troubled time. Like Poland's Solidarity labor movement, strikes and worker's demands for free unionism have also emerged in the Ukraine. Estonia, and federated Russia.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the people of the Eighth Congressional District of New Jersey and the people of New Jersey, I join in saluting the heroic Ukrainian people on the anniversary of this important day in their lives. May it serve as a hope for all Ukrainians to maintain in their hearts, that with God's help, their self-destiny as a nation may once again become a reality.●

● Mr. FARY. Mr. Speaker, today the Ukraine is a captive nation. We often use the phrase "Captive Nation," just as we speak of the "Iron Curtain," without thinking about what it really means. The images brought to mind by these phrases can give us an idea what it must be like to be a Ukrainian today.

If, by the word "nation," we mean a homogenous group of people who speak the same language, have similar values and share a rich culture, and if we imagine all those people deprived of their human rights and imprisoned so to speak, just for being themselves, we begin to appreciate the implication of the phrase "Captive Nation."

The Ukrainians in this country know how that feels and they work to make us remember that their homeland has been held captive by the Soviet Union for many years now. I am sure that this has often been a frustrating and thankless endeavor. However, without forgetting their moral obligation to fight for freedom for the Ukraine, Ukrainians in this country have always been good friends and neighbors. They and immigrants from other captive nations have added to the richness and variety that is American by sharing their unique cultures and traditions with us.

I would like to think that we Americans have always been receptive to Ukrainian requests for help and support but I am sure that support is easier to come by since the apparent death of détente. The imposition of martial law, and suppression of freedoms in Poland is the most recent example of the Soviet Union's policy of violating the human rights of their neighbors as well as those of the captive nationalities living within their borders.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the people of the Fifth Congressional District of Illinois and the people of Illinois I join in saluting the heroic Ukrainian people on the anniversary of this important day in their lives. May it serve as a hope for all Ukrainians to maintain in their hearts, that with God's help, their self-destiny as a nation may once again become a reality.●

● Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, January 22, 1982, marks the 64th anniversary of the declaration of independence from Russia by the Ukrainian nation which resulted from the Russian monarchy collapse of 1917.

Following the Bolshevik victory in 1920, a separate Ukrainian Republic was established with other national republics, all with theoretical rights of sovereignty, including a constitutional right to secede from the Soviet Union. These changes were nominal, as they only represented a move to appease the Ukrainians by the Soviet Government.

"Ethnic cultural autonomy" was supposedly granted to all ethnic minorities as a result of an "independent" Ukraine, which included Byelorussians, Jews, Poles, and Russians. this entitled them to a right and power to socio-cultural self-government, direct representation both in local and national government, and to strong financial support by the state for the preservation of their own languages and cultures.

It is only natural that a denial of these fundamental rights would inevitably lead the Ukrainians on a collision course with Moscow's centralizing instincts.

Poland's labor movement has served as incentive for the 50 million Ukrainians, as Kiev experienced a series of strikes in protest of higher work quotas and poor living conditions. Other cities seethed with worker discontent, under the watchful Kremlin eye.

Comprising 20 percent of the Soviet population, the Ukrainians are the most numerous of the non-Russian Soviet peoples. It is essential that we recognize the efforts of the fiercely independent people of the Ukraine, who have, and will continue to protest the bondage inflicted upon them by the Russian Government. It is with great hopes for freedom, justice, and self-determination that I join today in asserting Ukrainian consciousness.●

● Mr. HOLLENBECK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to recognize the 64th anniversary of the Proclamation of Independence of the Ukraine National Republic and direct my colleagues' attention to my remarks as they appeared in yesterday's RECORD. I want to thank the gentlemen from New York and Illinois for their thoughtfulness in arranging today's special order, and had I been aware that they were taking this action would have enthusiastically participated. Unfortunately, I received notification of this special order after my remarks in yesterday's RECORD had already been published.●

● Mr. DWYER. Mr. Speaker, as we rise today to commemorate the 64th anniversary of the establishment of an independent Ukraine, it is right that we look at the present situation in that republic and note that for the Ukrainian people, the independence born that fateful January day in 1918 has never ended.

Interrupted, yes, by the yoke of repressive Soviet rule, but just as defiantly, the drive for an independent Ukraine continues against all odds, forever steadfast.

There is perhaps no greater evidence of Ukrainian tenacity and vitality than in the hearts and minds of those members of the Ukrainian Helsinki Monitoring Group, all of whom have suffered imprisonment or exile for their bravery and conviction that promises made should be kept.

I have had the privilege of sponsoring a resolution paying tribute to the formation and endurance of this courageous group, and calling on the Soviet Union to end its harassment of the Ukrainian Helsinki monitors.

It is a well-known fact that the Soviet Union has not lived up to its Helsinki promises and, on the 64th anniversary of the Ukraine's all-too-brief period of independence, we must seize this opportunity and every other, to remind the oppressors of their duplicity.

The seemingly endless struggle for justice is sometimes frustrating, yet always worthwhile. We need only to look to the Ukrainian story and that of the Helsinki monitors for inspiration to never relent, until the liberty the Ukrainian people know and love becomes an enduring reality.●

● Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Speaker, the latest events in the Polish crisis have once again reminded us of the long, tragic history of czarist and Soviet Russian oppression of the people who have the misfortune to live along the periphery of Russia. The names of the captive people of first the Russian and now the Soviet Empire encompass people in Europe, like the Poles and Lithuanians and Turkic people across the Asian steppes like the Kazakhs and Tatars.

This week we commemorate the nation perhaps most experienced with the hand of Russian oppression: the Ukraine. Sixty-four years ago, amid the conflagration of the First World War and the collapse of the old czarist empire, the beacon of Ukrainian independence shone forth. Sadly, it had a brief life, as the Ukraine became one of the earliest victims of a new kind of Russian imperialism, Bolshevism.

Since then, the Ukraine has known as well as any nation the arbitrary, violent, and all too efficient hand of Russian communism. It suffered most grievously the force collectivization of 50 years ago, when Stalin's enslavement of the peasantry killed millions and sent countless others into the shivering hell of the still young Gulag Archipelago. Not content with his destruction of Ukrainian agriculture, which, hard as it may be to believe today, was once the breadbasket of Europe, Stalin intensified his war against the Ukraine. He abolished the independent Ukrainian Orthodox Church and tried to bury it in the Russian Orthodox faith. In 1946, he abolished the Uniate Church of Ukrainian Catholicism, and crudely forced its worshipers to adopt the Orthodox faith. Today, Ukrainian Catholics must practice their faith underground, in secret, just as did the early Christians in ancient Rome almost 2,000 years ago.

Not satisfied with denying Ukrainians their religion, the Soviet Russians have carried on and perfected czarist cultural oppression. While the Ukrainian language has not been formally banned, there is constant, unyielding pressure to reduce it to a second-class, backward tongue. Ukrainian indigenous history has been ignored, and the benefits of russification glorified.

On this solemn occasion, we must bear witness to the Ukrainian Insurgent Army, an estimated 180,000 men who arose spontaneously in World War II to fight the Nazi invaders and then heroically continued their fight for freedom against their Soviet Russian invaders after 1945. It took the Russians more than 5 years to stamp out this movement for self determination.

On this occasion, we must also take note of the courageous members of the Ukrainian Helsinki Watch Group, who banded together in November 1976 to remind the Kremlin and the world outside of the Soviet "Union's" signature on the Helsinki accords. Of the 37 members, 36 have been arrested and imprisoned under unimaginable conditions of brutality, or exiled from the country.

Last year, there were reports of strikes in factories in the western Ukraine and in the Kiev region. If accurate, these protests would show there remains a flickering light of human dignity and conscience in the Ukraine. May it grow and spread, and end the long night of the Ukrainian people.●

● Ms. FERRARO. Mr. Speaker, January 22, 1918, commemorates an important and emotional day in Ukrainian history. It was on this day that the people of the Ukraine achieved their freedom and independence from their powerful neighbors. This freedom and independence, however, was short lived. By 1920 the Ukrainian independent state was crushed by a more powerful Soviet Government.

As Americans, we direct our attention to the plight of the Ukrainian people for several reasons. First, the Ukraine is the largest non-Russian nation both within the Soviet Union and all of Eastern Europe. Second, as Americans, most of us have not been subjected to harassment, arrest or persecution because of our personal beliefs. The United States has the right to question Soviet denial of fundamental freedoms to Ukrainian citizens under the 1975 Helsinki agreement. Third, after decades of occupation, the people of the Ukraine have maintained their strong love and desire for freedom and independence.

The Ukrainian people may only be strengthened by the continued attention of the free world leaders and press. Only when Soviet policies are revealed and repudiated by the rest of the civilized world, will these authorities make some concessions to humanitarian principles.

The recent events in Poland, as well as the intimidation of the members of the Ukrainian Helsinki Monitoring Group, have shown time and again Soviet brutalities in the treatment of the peoples whose homelands they have invaded. I, therefore, urge my colleagues to join with other freedom loving peoples throughout the world in support of the successful efforts of the Ukrainian people to resist russification policies. American support for Ukrainian independence is traditionally important and right.●

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to help mark the 64th anniversary of Ukrainian Independence Day, which we are celebrating at this time.

What the Afghans experienced on December 7, 1979, the Ukrainian nation suffered shortly after January 22, 1918. Alone and without aid from Western nations, the Ukrainian people waged a gallant struggle to defend the sovereignty of their country, but were ultimately overpowered by numerically stronger and better equipped armed forces. If Afghanistan, like the Ukraine, becomes yet another captive nation, its people can expect reprisals for any resistance to Soviet rule and the subversion and destruction of their heritage as a free country.

I take this opportunity to mention one of the great Ukrainians of our day. I speak of Mykola Danylovych Rudenko who was the founder of the Ukrainian Public Group to Promote Observance of the Helsinki accords. Mr. Rudenko formed this monitoring group in November 1976, and a year later, after police searches and harassment, he was arrested. Rudenko was sentenced at a closed trial on July 1, 1977, to 7 years in strict regimen labor camps followed by 5 years of internal exile under article 62 of the Ukrainian Criminal Code, anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda. He is in extremely poor health. Although the Soviets signed the Final Act at Helsinki, the human rights provisions of the Final Act have never—not even for 1 day—been observed in the Ukraine.

At this time when the right to national self-determination is being threatened in other areas of the world, we will not forget the Ukrainian struggle of 64 years ago, or overlook the ongoing question of the Ukrainian people. I pay tribute to them and to their never ending goals of freedom, human rights, and independence.●

● Mr. MINISH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take time to join my colleagues on the floor of the House to commemorate the 64th anniversary of the Proclamation of Independence of the Ukraine National Republic.

We know that the cherished freedoms brought about by the Ukrainian Independence were unfortunately short lived. Soviet troops soon annexed this land as part of the U.S.S.R. Since that time, the courageous Ukrainian people have been forced to live under Soviet domination. This is the largest non-Russian nation in Eastern Europe which is held captive. Ukrainians look to the United States where we can be very proud of the freedoms that we enjoy and we know that others in the world consider us both an example and an inspiration.

At this very moment we are all too painfully aware of the Soviet presence in Poland and the manner in which this powerful country is attempting, but not wholly achieving, the subordination of the Poles. With this current reminder of Soviet aggression, let us be ever more vigilent in our monitoring of basic freedoms.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the Ukrainian people for their struggle against the domination of the Soviet Union and fervently hope that one day this will not be the case.●

● Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, in the six decades since 1917, the free world has repeatedly witnessed the Soviet Union exert its bear hug over the rights and national aspirations of its neighbors. In few instances have these grabs for domination been successfully resisted. And, in no instance has Soviet oppression been so brutally evident as in the 1921 Ukrainian takeover.

This past Friday, January 22, was the 64th anniversary of the declaration of independence in the Ukraine. Though short-lived following that declaration, Ukrainian independence has survived as an ideal in the hearts of people the world over. Despite an unremitting propaganda campaign, the Stalinist purges, and an atmosphere of terror, these nationalistic ambitions are nowhere stronger than in the Ukraine itself.

Ukrainians have added enormously to the cultural richness and variety of the western world. In considering these vast contributions, however, we cannot help but gage the unrealized contributions of Ukrainians who did not survive Russia's barbarism. In this light, it is all of us, not only the Ukrainians, who have been deprived. And, it is all of us who should look to a day when all people, as citizens of independent nations, can make their contributions to mankind.

As we mark this anniversary in Ukrainian history, and recognize the hopes that live today, we should neither overlook the lessons of the past, nor forget the aspirations of the future. While the Soviets have been able to dominate the Ukraine, they will never be able to rule its people's hopes for freedom.●

INVESTMENTS IN INDUSTRIAL ENERGY PRODUCTIVITY: EXTENSION OF THE BUSINESS ENERGY TAX CREDIT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. WYDEN) is recognized for 15 minutes.

● Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, we are witness to an era when energy costs are quickly becoming more than simple additional "pass along" costs of production. They are the fastest-rising part of many firms' cost structures, crowding profit margins and eating away at their competitive positions within industry.

Cost-effective investments in increased energy productivity are difficult for industry to make when, today, many American industries have trouble accumulating sufficient capital to satisfy their primary objective: Maintaining adequate and productive capacity available to serve their market.

When industry must pass over investments in equipment, such as that for cogeneration, which utilizes energy that is otherwise wasted, our economy suffers and our reliance on imported oil remains.

For these reasons, today I am introducing a bill to preserve the existing 10 percent tax credit for business investments in conservation and alternative energy systems. This tax credit's goal is to further our shift away from dependence on foreign oil by encouraging business firms to purchase cogeneration equipment, boilers and burners that use fuels other than oil and natural gas, and conservation equipment.

The tax credit, under provisions of the Windfall Profit Tax Act, is scheduled to expire December 31, 1982. To let this credit expire, Mr. Speaker, would be to turn our backs on a most cost-effective means of producing energy at costs far below those of conventional new sources of energy from oil and gas.

The extension of this tax credit will take advantage of the potentially important and beneficial role of cogeneration, biomass and coal in our Nation's energy future, by further facilitating the transition from an energy economy based on cheap, abundant supplies of oil—over 40 percent of which is imported—and natural gas to one in which the use of scarce and imported fuels is restrained and increasing use is made of coal and other domestic energy sources, as well as energy conservation.

This business investment incentive also makes a modest but effective contribution to the attainment of our Nation's most important goal: To put our economy on sound footing through investments in new plant and equipment, creating new jobs and enhancing our Nation's competitiveness in the international marketplace.

I can think of no better path to follow to this end than one that will stimulate capital investments in energy-efficient production while reducing future energy-related operating costs, positioning our industry in better financial condition with respect to retained earnings for new investments in modernization and expansion.

As Government can do no more harm to business investments than to create uncertainty, I hope my colleagues will support passage of an extension of this investment tax credit in order that it is consistent with today's investment planning horizons.

Perhaps no other industry better illustrates the case for extending the business energy investment credit than the forest products industry. Though admittedly an industry close to my heart, I believe it aptly illustrates both the need for investments in expansion and modernization to compete in the international marketplace and the potential energy efficiency gains to be made.

In 1981, the increase in U.S. paper companies spending for new plant and equipment was essentially flat, at $7 billion. There are three principal reasons: High interest rates, reduced cash flows, and uncertainty over the President's tax program. Canadian companies, on the other hand, boosted investment outlays by 42 percent to $2 billion in 1981.

Extending the tax credit will not solve our high interest rates, but it will eliminate any uncertainties surrounding the availability of the tax credit for plant expansion, replacement or modernization investments—investments that typically occur on a 4- to 5-year planning basis.

On the energy efficiency side, from an international perspective, the true potential for efficiency gains are compelling. The average U.S. mill, for example, consumes 30 to 50 percent more process heat than its Scandinavian counterpart. The average integrated paper mill in Scandinavia is about 80 percent energy self-sufficient, while a U.S. mill is normally not more than 50 percent self-sufficient. Thus, the average U.S. mill buys 2.5 times more energy than Scandinavian experience has shown to be necessary.

The necessity of reducing energy usage and costs will dominate many capital spending decisions in the years ahead, and it is not confined to the forest products industry. Industry is eager to back out oil and gas consumption and to increase plant efficiencies. All too often the missing ingredient is the incremental capital to invest toward those goals.

The business energy investment credit provides this ingredient. One need only consider the increasing use of the credit as evidence of this. In 1979 over $1 billion in energy investments qualified for the alternate energy tax credit, costing the Treasury $100 million. Based on Treasury Department projections, the magnitude of qualifying energy investments in future years will vastly exceed the 1979 figures.

This loss of tax revenues is a small price to pay when one considers the over $3 billion in lost tax revenues from the oil and gas depletion allowances and intangible drilling cost deductions or the $1 billion per year we spend on nuclear energy research, uranium enrichment services, and nuclear industry regulation.

By acting responsibly and swiftly in eliminating the 1982 deadline on this credit, Congress will demonstrate its commitment to energy independence and new plant investment.●

THE COLD FACT ABOUT AUTOMATIC TELLER MACHINES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, those of us who follow banking trends have noted the explosion of automated banking procedures over the last few years. There has been a virtual revolution in the way people can conduct their most standard banking transactions. It is now possible to deposit your paycheck, pay your bills, transfer funds from checking to savings and contribute to your retirement fund without ever having to put pen to paper or seeing the inside of a bank.

Perhaps the kingpin of this electronic banking age is the automatic teller machine or ATM. The amazing ATM can take your money, make payments on your loans, disburse cash to you in various denominations, and still hope that you have a nice day.

It has been predicted that the growth in ATM's will skyrocket as people become accustomed to their convenience, speed, and accessible business hours. But before anyone rushes out and purchases stock in companies which manufacture these wonders, I would like to call attention to a recent Merit Report survey. It seems that a whopping 89 percent of those people surveyed still prefer the personal touch of a real live bank teller to a machine when given the choice.

So while it may seem that you can conduct your banking business faster, and do it at most any time of the day with the aid of an ATM, the hard truth is that people still find comfort in those two little words, "next please."●

IS NATO DEAD?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ) is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise because during the interim period that we were in the district, events shaped that have, of course, agitated the headlines of the newspapers with respect to Poland, but also corollary issues that I believe have reached the point of crisis. I have stated back home reflecting the action that I took in addressing myself by way of two letters, one to the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, the Honorable CLEMENT ZABLOCKI, and the other to the chairman of the Armed Services Committee of the House of Representatives, Mr. MELVIN PRICE.

The reason is that I am extremely concerned at the failure of our country to address itself to the absolute need now of the shaping and molding of consistent and coherent policy, both on a short-term basis as well as a long-term basis, with respect to Europe. There is no question in my mind that the developments in Poland and all anchor down a fear that I have entertained now for some time that NATO, such as was devised at the same time that such other programs as Bretton Woods in the international finance sector was devised, is dead.

In my opinion, NATO to all intents and practical purposes is dead. We have got to shape policy that addresses itself to the utmost concern that I have entertained now for some time, and that is the safety and the well-being, for example, of 300,000 Americans that are in Germany alone, in Europe, where I feel that the continuing situation unaddressed is a constant threat to their well-being, safety, and stability, and also to reexamine our role.

Obviously, the manifestations in Europe should be troubling to us for they indicate that there is more concern about our presence and that our troops are looked upon not as defense troops but troops of occupation, without a comparable fear to the reason why our troops are there to begin with, which is to insure European protection. But there seems to be more concern about American presence than Russian threat. Yet one-half of our defense budget or better, $100 billion-plus, is being dedicated by the American taxpayers for the purposes of the defense of Europe.

So for that reason I have written these two letters to these two chairmen, asking them to revise fundamentally the question of policy, since there is no question in my mind that up to now the administration is in disorder in this respect. We are ending up ironically in starving the Poles and feeding the Russians, and this with all of the best intentions of an administration that seems to want to persist in the indulgence of the illusion that we still can continue with things as usual, as customary, since 1945.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent I may be permitted to insert in the RECORD copies of both of those letters, as well as remarks that I addressed to the local chapter in San Antonio, Tex., of the Reserve Officers Association.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

(The material follows:)

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., January 7, 1982.

Hon. CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Affairs, Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CLEM: I know that you have watched the tragic events in Poland with the same dismay that I have. The developments there have clearly unmasked fundamental weaknesses and contradictions in our whole European policy. It is, I believe, essential that the Congress, through your Committee, review the whole situation in Europe and work to construct a new and effective policy.

The actions to crush Solidarity should not have come as a surprise to our government, after earlier experiences in Poland and elsewhere. Only the agents of repression are different this time: Polish troops rather than Russian. As for the United States, our government month after month did nothing effective to support the Polish economy nor provide any other kind of practical assistance that might have strengthened the process of freedom that was beginning to develop. In fact, throughout the last year, our government made practically no mention of Poland, let alone provide any leadership to encourage what was the most hopeful struggle against repression in all of the world. What is more, after the ax fell, the Administration seemed wholly unprepared to respond. Nor were our European allies prepared to join in any response. The whole experience bespeaks an inability to grasp opportunity, to exercise forethought or leadership, or to do anything more than engage in a kind of futile and sporadic cheerleading.

With respect to Europe itself, it is ironic that no government there is willing to join in any kind of effective action to impose sanctions against Poland or the Soviet Union. This reveals NATO, itself, as a hollow shell, rendered without credibility both by its relative weakness and by the tired cynicism of European powers themselves. Chancellor Schmidt plainly displayed this in his comments published in the January 3, New York Times. He did not see the situation in Poland as a crisis: "not a crisis at all." He thought that economic sanctions would not be of much practical effect, "but, of course, psychologically, politically, they will have great effect in Moscow." And then: "But we would find it very difficult ourselves to apply sanctions against Poland."

Chancellor Schmidt, in discussing the presence of American forces, called upon us to understand why his countrymen demonstrate against U.S. forces, and then with tired cynicism commented that the United States would not reduce its forces in Europe: "Such discussions (of a troop withdrawal) come and go and come and go. You would abdicate from your leadership role in the Western world and I think the political elites in the U.S. will always be sober enough not really to consider such a fatal move."

In short, on both sides of the Atlantic there is a fatalistic, unthinking mentality, the same kind of mentality that led to the great and tragic wars of this century. Europe wants only to be left alone; somehow it will either not be invaded or will find an accommodation; and somehow the United States will prevent any ultimate tragedy from taking place. As for the United States, we are unable to create a design that will either draw Europe out of its inward-directed preoccupations or cause its powers even to live up to their NATO force level commitments. Our own forces are resented, but the great powers of Europe will not provide adequate forces of their own: the United States spends more than all our allies combined on defense, and we spend more of our gross national product on defense. No matter how you measure the level of effort, our commitment is not matched. In not one of the last three years have our allies on the whole met their commitments to improve NATO forces. In fact, Germany will this year actually lessen its efforts.

These are times of profound importance. The leadership of the Soviet Union is aging and uncertain. The grand design of European defense is faltering. Our allies are querulous and timid. Our own leadership is preoccupied with domestic affairs and internal personality conflicts. I urge that your Committee undertake a review of the whole strategic and political situation in Europe, and how the United States should respond to it. More is at stake than our relations with Europe itself—as is suggested by the confusion that marks our relations with the Soviet Union itself: our arms buildup against Russian power, combined with our vastly expanding trade with the Soviet Union, reveals a fundamental contradiction in the assessment of Russian intentions, and what our role should be toward that power. Our country cannot afford its continued drifting, its continued lack of initiative, nor its abandonment of genuine leadership. Your Committee can do much to overcome this dangerous drift, and it is the only body of the Congress that is properly equipped to do what must be done. I know that you will respond to this challenge, and assure you of my support.

With best wishes, I am,

Sincerely yours,

HENRY B. GONZALEZ,
Member of Congress.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., January 7, 1982.

Hon. MELVIN PRICE,
Chairman, Committee on Armed Services, 2120 Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MEL: I am intensely concerned about the living and working conditions of United States troops in Europe. Moreover, I am distressed that our allies, whose security is assured by those troops, do so little to provide support for them.

I know that you are personally aware of the abysmal facilities that our European forces live and work in. I know that you are aware that Germany, for example, feels that it owes little to the support of American troops, except for providing the land that they use. It may be natural that German expenditures go first to the benefit of the German Army, but it is more than a little ironic that our own forces must live in and use facilities captured and left unimproved since the days of the Wehrmacht.

Your Committee has made numerous efforts to encourage European powers to provide decent support to our troops, and you have likewise undertaken to authorize use of American funds to provide necessary facilities. For various reasons, those commendable efforts sometimes have been frustrated. I urge that you continue to work with all possible effort to insure that our troops are provided decent and affordable living conditions, and that their working facilities be adequate for the equipment they must maintain, and the climatic conditions within which they must work. It is simply intolerable that a multimillion dollar tank must be washed with a garden hose and maintained in a mudhole, or troops live in cold and leaky barracks.

I believe that your Committee should review the adequacy of the commitment our allies have made to NATO. Our allies do not expend anything like the proportion of national wealth that we do on defense, even though half of our total effort is dedicated to the security of Europe, alone. Our allies are not meeting their commitments to enhance the capability of their own forces, and have not done so for any one of the past three years. That lack of commitment is reflected, not just in the lack of effort our allies put into their own defense, but in their unwillingness to follow American leadership or provide any credible alternative of their own. I do not believe that we should rest with the comfortable assumption that recent, large scale antinuclear demonstrations in various European countries was simply an expression of concern about nuclear war: fundamentally they were demonstrations against American power, American policy, and the presence of American forces.

Unless our allies repair the fabric of NATO, we should reassess our own position. I do not for a moment believe that the kidnapping of our top commander in Italy reflects any significant opinion there—but I am deeply concerned that our allies have made no expression of outrage about the incident. I am even more concerned that NATO seems more preoccupied with penalizing its own member, Turkey, for its military coup than confronting Poland with similar rage. I fear that the gradual, and now clear, loss of coherent and unified will, might one day result in the embarrassing ejection of our forces from Europe.

Questions of foreign policy are of course beyond the scope of your Committee jurisdiction. But American forces both affect and are affected by our foreign policy. I believe that you can review the adequacy of the commitment our allies have toward NATO, and that you can move to insure that our troops live and work in the conditions that we want and expect, and that they are not committed to a meaningless role, that they are not exposed to a hopeless mission, and that they will enjoy a real level of support from our allies. They are not, after all, forces of occupation, but troops committed to mutual security. The question in my mind is how mutual that commitment is.

You have provided real leadership, and it has made a lasting impact. Our concerns are mutual, and I urge that you, through your Committee, continue to assess the proper role of our forces committed to NATO, and to evaluate ways and means to either obtain the support they ought to have, or modify their mission.

With best wishes, I am,

Sincerely,

HENRY B. GONZALEZ,
Member of Congress.

REMARKS OF HENRY B. GONZALEZ, RESERVE OFFICERS ASSOCIATION, SAN ANTONIO, TEX., JANUARY 20, 1982

Seems to be for some time now the universal feeling that the world exists on the thin edge of Armageddon. Everyone knows that not only do the superpowers possess the ultimate means of destruction—but that smaller powers, less stable powers—are also coming to possess the ability to build and use nuclear weapons. The variables in the equation of violence keep growing, and threaten to further destabilize a spinning top that is already wobbling on its axis. That is part of the danger we face: the power we and our principal antagonists have in our hands, and the growing power in the hands of lesser known antagonists—who nevertheless, like that forgotten Balkan land of so long ago, can bring the whole world down into a storm of violence.

Everyone knows, too, that Poland has taught us once more of the limits of our own power. No matter how much we have invested in placing our troops in Europe, no matter that half our defense budget goes for the defense of Europe, we would have been hopelessly overmatched in any effort to intervene in Poland. Not only that: far more ominously, we know that our allies will not even support us in any kind of meaningful trade sanctions. We have granted a sphere of influence in Poland, and no matter how we might like to call it otherwise, neither we nor our allies are prepared to change the status quo there.

Finally, everyone knows that we are engaged in a buildup of military forces that will cost a trillion and a half dollars long before this decade ever ends. There are no words that will describe the vastness of this buildup, nor are there powers of the imagination that can picture the forces that will be placed in the hands of our soldiers, airmen and sailors through this buildup.

We are living in a world in which the ultimate power—nuclear war—is not survivable. The paradox and dilemma is that we are not certain what our conventional forces can do—or even what they should be called on to do. We are in the midst of a time when serious, basic, fundamental questions have to be asked—lest we find ourselves attempting the impossible or fooled into risking the unnecessary.

This is axiomatic: military forces are not an end unto themselves. Military forces cannot be built for the sake of having forces. Military power is not an end in itself—but rather an instrument of national policy.

If national policy is one thing and military forces are tailored for another, then both policy and forces are wrong and dangerous. If our policy makes one commitment, but our forces cannot insure that commitment, then we have no ability to carry out that policy or defend it against antagonists. By the same token, if we have power but no policy at all, then we have no way of even guessing whether the power is adequate or appropriate to whatever policy we evolve.

If we have interests that we aim to protect, and policies that we aim to support, military power is a necessity. There can never be any question of that. But in devising our military forces, we have to be certain that the forces fit the policies—for if they don't, neither the policy nor the military forces will be realistic, neither will be able to accomplish its hoped-for end—which is the preservation of our nation and the protection of our fundamental interests.

The question we face today is not just one of building unprecedented military power. The question is how that power fits into policy. Ultimately, it is the question of just what our national interests really are. Are our forces in Europe fulfilling our policy, protecting our basic national interests? Are they in fact hostage to other powers, other interests? Are they really essential, or are the impediments to our own goals? We have not examined fundamental policy in Europe for many decades—but the world has changed immensely in that time. Do our policies—and hence our forces—really reflect what is needed today, really protect what must be protected, really promote the peace that must be preserved, if the planet is to survive at all?

Our friends in Europe presume that our forces are going to be there, no matter what. They feel that they can afford to go their own way—to disassociate from the United States politically, even economically, because our military power is still going to be there, present to protect them—and the status quo. They presume that we have no choice but to remain with three hundred thousand troops, a good part of our air force, and most all our national commitment—all to preserve the status quo, the more or less balanced interests that finally settled out of the postwar period. But we have to ask: is that really so? If our allies feel free to disassociate from us, doesn't that mean there is a divergence in basic interests? Doesn't that mean the status quo is something for them—but not necessarily ourselves—to protect?

No matter how we look at history, the fact emerges that the United States and the Soviet Union have not been at war with one another. We have contested through surrogates; we have struggled against mutual ambitions—but we have not gone to war. Whatever the reason may be, the Russians have not invaded Alaska, any more than we have invaded Cuba.

We have not sought to match the Russians, man for man and tank for tank in Europe, and why? Because even though we might hope to preserve the status quo, it is not fundamentally our aim to invade their country, any more than it is in their interest to invade our own.

I do not say that we should trust the Russians. I do not say that we need not fear them. But the fact is that our policy is confused, and our military therefore is given missions that are not clearly defined—and therefore missions that they can neither know nor well prepare for.

If we have a great military threat facing us, it makes no sense that the United States would sell 28 million tons of grain to Russia a year—as we are now. It makes no sense that we would encourage the growth of ever-more sophisticated trade. Those are actions—economic actions—that strengthen the Russian nation, even as we are arming ourselves to match their power. Our economic policy we are following reflects a judgment that our basic interest is one thing—while the military policy shows a judgment that is completely opposite.

If it is true that our basic interest lies in negotiation rather than confrontation, then we ought to have a policy that is coherent—a policy that says, let us negotiate, and let us be realistic about it. If you cooperate, you will find us responsive. If you do not match your promises with performances, you will find that we will not negotiate. It makes sense to link one policy with another. If we aim to follow a policy of confrontation, then it makes no sense to carry on trade and negotiation, as if none of those three things is related to the rest. Likewise, if we aim to carry on negotiations, it makes no sense to fail to link our other policies with that basic decision.

If we examine our most fundamental, our most basic national interests, we might well find that our military commitments do not match those interests. It is our power behind which Europe builds its economic base—for we protect their status quo. It is possible—and we have to think this way—that Europe could do more on its own and for itself. We might well find that we could use that same money and those same resources to protect something that is more basic to ourselves—say our access to oil and vital raw materials. And we have to ask ourselves even such heretical questions as whether or not we could reduce tension in Europe by removing at least some of our forces there—possibly even convincing the Russians to reduce their own forces.

We have to ask ourselves just where our most basic interests are—just how to protect them and just how to project those interests. No one else will do that for us. No one else will carry that burden for us.

We have to ask ourselves whether or not our policy is coherent. Does what we do make sense in terms of what we say? Does our policy reflect the real world, or are we prisoner to some dream, even some past that is only a shadow? Are we wasting efforts—fooling ourselves?

World leaders are of necessity frightened people—and should be, because the price of misunderstanding and miscalculation is absolute doom. Now that almost four decades have elapsed since the evolution of the superpowers, now that missiles and computers command the destiny of the planet, and now that old rivalries have risen again, in the ashes of alliances, maybe it is time to reassess where we are and what we are doing. We cannot be too careful—but we dare not let our determination to survive stand in the way of our clear thinking about the best way to survive. We cannot let our guard down—but neither can we afford to build and maintain a guard against threats that are not real. We cannot prevent day from dawning nor sun from setting—but we cannot fail to see that different times demand different responses. And I wonder if the time has not come for us to see if time has not robbed some of our policies of their real integrity. If not, why then do we see our forces' calls for assistance, for cooperation, rejected almost out of hand? And why do we see European leaders—on our own soil—blandly saying that of course there is no choice but for the Americans to maintain their force in Europe? Maybe in fact we do have a choice. Maybe in fact our interests have changed. Maybe in fact our forces could better be used to protect more fundamental interests . . . but we will never know unless we challenge our own assumptions.

It is axiomatic that military power is not an end in itself. Military power has to reflect clear national policy. As things stand today, we must recognize that our national policy is not clear, anywhere in the world—which is why our forces have been entangled in hopeless causes, why our soldiers even today are faced with confusion and revulsion in Europe, and why we ourselves are not certain what we need to deal with the world—for we do not know what it is we are to deal with. Our vision has to be clear—our motives plain—and our forces adequate. The first thing we have to do is look carefully and see clearly, lest we be on guard in the wrong place against the wrong threat and at the wrong time. And no one will see for us—nor can we ever rest with comfortable assumptions—because it is in the wrong assumptions that history's mistakes are made. In this world, we have to be right the first time.

PILOT DON USHER AND PARAMEDIC GENE WINDSOR COMMENDED FOR THEIR COURAGE

(Mr. YATES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, on the afternoon of Wednesday, January 13, I watched television coverage of the tragic Air Florida crash. When I saw the clips of the National Park Service helicopter Eagle I it was obvious that the pilot was operating his craft at a considerable threat to his own life. When I saw the paramedic step out onto the skid and reach down to pull an exhausted survivor into the helicopter, I felt like cheering.

Mr. Speaker, the pilot was Don Usher and the paramedic was Gene Windsor. They have received much acclaim. Their response is to say they were just doing their jobs. I would like to take this opportunity to again commend them for their courage and for their devotion to others. There actions were in the finest tradition of the Park Service.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert the letters I sent to Messrs. Usher and Windsor at this point for the RECORD:

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
Washington, D.C., January 20, 1982.

Mr. GENE WINDSOR,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. WINDSOR: I was watching television coverage Wednesday afternoon of the Air Florida rescue efforts. When I saw pictures of you stepping down to the skid in order to reach down and pull up a survivor I felt like applauding. Your disregard for your own personal safety in order to save the life of another was inspiring. I want to commend you for your personal courage and for the concern you showed for the life of others.

Your actions were a credit to you as an individual and as an employee of the National Park Service. I have often said that the people who actually staff the parks and who do the work are of exceptional quality and ability. Your actions Wednesday increased my admiration for those traits immeasurably. I will cite the actions of yourself and Mr. Usher as examples of the valuable service provided by Federal employees. I am proud to be associated with individuals such as yourself who form the strong backbone of the National Park Service.

Again, I want to commend you for your courage and devotion to others.

With warm personal regards.

Sincerely,

SIDNEY R. YATES,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Interior and Related Agencies.

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS,
Washington, D.C., January 20, 1982.

Mr. DON USHER,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. USHER: While watching television coverage Wednesday afternoon of efforts being made to rescue survivors of the plane crash I was thrilled by your skillful handling of the Park Police helicopter. It was obvious that continued efforts to rescue people was at considerable risk to your own life. I want to commend you for showing such concern. Your actions were a credit to you as an individual and as an employee of the National Park Service. I have long said that the people in the Service who actually staff the parks and do the work are of exceptional quality and ability. Your actions Wednesday increased my admiration immeasurably. I will cite your actions and those of Mr. Windsor as examples of the valuable service provided by Federal employees. I am proud to be associated with individuals such as yourself who form the strong backbone of the National Park Service.

Again, I wish to commend you for your courage and devotion to others.

With warm personal regards.

Sincerely,

SIDNEY R. YATES,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Interior and Related Agencies.

AMERICAN LEGION DISTINGUISHED ACHIEVEMENT AWARD

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. PEPPER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, distinguished colleagues, and all who read this RECORD, it is my pleasure to commend to your attention an outstanding young lady who I am proud to have as a resident of the 14th Congressional District of Florida, which I represent in Congress, Miss Maria Koch.

Miss Koch, daughter of Fred and Sarah Koch of Coral Gables, Fla., recently received fitting and well-deserved recognition for her outstanding achievements and contributions to her community. She was awarded the American Legion Distinguished Achievement Award by the American Legion Post 98. This award was presented in recognition of Miss Koch's having earlier received the American Legion School Award and particularly for possessing those qualities of courage, honor, leadership, patriotism, scholarship, and service which are necessary to the preservation and protection of the fundamental institutions of our Government and the advancement of society.

Miss Koch, who is currently enrolled in Our Lady of Lourdes Academy, represents all that is finest in our Nation's youth and serves as an example to all of us of the personal characteristics that make people and a nation great.●

U.S. INTERESTS JEOPARDIZED BY LAW OF THE SEA TREATY

(Mr. HARTNETT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. HARTNETT. Mr. Speaker, my good friend and colleague JACK FIELDS has committed himself to stimulating discussion on the past and current negotiations surrounding the so-called Law of the Sea Treaty. I am pleased to place in the RECORD excerpts of a recent article upon that important subject.

U.S. INTERESTS JEOPARDIZED BY LAW OF THE SEA TREATY

(By Peter Keisler)

Most of the American people don't care very much about mineral resource regulation, about seabed mining, or about manganese nodules on the ocean floor. It is therefore unsurprising that the proposed Law of the Sea Treaty has attracted such scant public interest.

On the other hand, there are a great many people who care about the resource war between the United States and the Soviet Union, about the growth of American industry, about the principles of free enterprise, and about the increasingly shrill Third World demands for massive transfers of wealth from the developed nations to the underdeveloped ones. All such people ought to care a great deal about the proposed Law of the Sea Treaty.

It's a technical subject, and the debate has therefore taken place mostly within the government. But no expertise is required to understand that acceptance of this treaty would mean our losing the resources of two-thirds of the earth's submerged lands without firing a shot.

At the crux of the dispute are the mineral resources at the bottom of the ocean, nodules rich in manganese, cobalt, nickel and copper. These resources are vital; we cannot produce a single jet engine without cobalt, nor a single ton of steel without manganese. Yet we are 95 percent dependent on external sources for manganese, 98 percent dependent for cobalt, and we are dependent on land-based sources that for varied reasons are unreliable. Current land producers may exhaust all known land-based supplies of these minerals within 50 years. We have an obvious interest in reducing our dependency on foreign producers. The importance of these ocean nodules and our desire for unrestricted access become clear.

Equally clear is the nature of the opposition to our attaining mineral resource independence through seabed mining. The Soviet Union is itself rich in those strategic minerals found in the oceans; restricting access to the ocean floor has a much more profound effect on our vulnerability than on theirs. Third World nations, in addition to desiring control of more resources, are interested in protecting Third World land-based minerals suppliers from American competition.

Participants in the debate universally agree that the resources of the ocean are "the common heritage of mankind." They disagree on the implications that follow. The United States has always interpreted this to mean that all have free access to development of ocean minerals, and that no one country or group of countries can claim prior ownership or control. This has been the governing doctrine, and anyone capable of mining has been able to do so.

To the Third World, however, "common heritage" means not "no ownership," but "shared ownership," each country having part control. From this interpretation flows the terms of a treaty designed to assert the prerogatives shared ownership implies.

The treaty goes way beyond the traditional sea issues, such as navigation and territorial definition. It creates a world bureaucracy to bring central economic planning to a new level. The voluntary contributions which have characterized U.S. aid to undeveloped nations would be replaced by compulsory wealth transfer to those who assert that such transfers are not gifts, but theirs by right.

Anyone who has ever been concerned at the direction the United Nations has taken should be infinitely more concerned about this treaty. The U.N. can do little more than pass impotent resolutions; the International Seabed Authority would be a U.N. with power.

Unlike at the United Nations, the United States would have no veto. There would be a Supreme Assembly—containing as many members as there are states party to the treaty—run on the one-nation, one-vote principle the President rejected at Cancun. The Assembly would be responsible for setting general policy.

The real power would lie in the Executive Council, composed of delegates from 36 states. The Council would deal with specific policy, including action on applications for seabed mining. Of these 36 key votes, the Soviet Union is guaranteed three—one for itself and two from other Soviet bloc states. The United States is not guaranteed a seat at all.

Any company wishing to begin seabed mining would first need the approval of the Council.

American companies would be required to transfer the sophisticated mining technology they have invented and developed to the Seabed Authority for common use. Without making such a transfer, no company would be awarded a single contract.

The Authority would be funded by heavy taxes on mines to which it awards contracts, ranging from $527 million to $1.3 billion, depending on the site's profitability.

An anti-monopoly provision would limit the number of mine sites that any one country could use—a provision whose effect would only be felt by the United States.

The treaty provides for the participation of "liberation groups." SWAPO and the PLO would have voting delegates, perhaps seats not guaranteed to us on the all-important Council.

A supernational mining company, ironically named The Enterprise, would be formed and given advantages over private miners.

The Authority would be able to amend its provisions in any way it sees fit after two decades, and our signature on the treaty guarantees our compliance with whatever changes are made.

Those who are anxious about the lack of American influence in the structure that would emerge will be comforted to hear of the one area in which there will be weighted representation. Each country's financial contribution to the Authority will be proportionate to its contribution to the upkeep of the United Nations. The United States, therefore, will be contributing the most—$125 million a year.

It is quite a treaty.

Some who are urging the President to sign have been doing so on the grounds that the sections on navigation are favorable enough to outweigh the remainder of the treaty. No less an authority than John Lehman, secretary of the Navy, said recently, "Our evaluation does not support this conclusion. In fact, from the point of view of our security interests, we must not only evaluate the navigation provisions . . . but the rules proposed for seabed mining as well."

Lobbying hardest for the treaty is Elliot Richardson, who negotiated it. Rep. Jack Fields, the Texas GOP freshman who has been outspoken in his opposition to the Draft Convention, tells of meeting Richardson and the other delegates at a reception in Geneva.

When Fields explained his concerns to the delegate from Peru, the delegate responded, "I don't care what you think. I don't care whether the Senate advises and consents to the treaty. I don't care whether the House passes implementing legislation. I just want your President to sign it."

At the same reception, Richardson told Fields that the congressman didn't understand the "big picture" and made the remarkable assertion that American industry supported the treaty. Richardson promised the congressman that he would have "mining companies camp at your doorstep" to demonstrate their support. So far, Rep. Field's doorstep has been bare.

These delegates are deadly serious. A very recent telegram from our embassy in Jamaica reported to the State Department that work will soon begin on an enormous conference center in Kingston (at a cost of $8 million) to house the International Seabed Authority.

President Reagan ordered an interagency review of the Draft Convention, a review which has just been completed. The final report has not been made public, but this much is known: while it presents several possible options, it does not include as one such option signing the treaty as is.

Nevertheless, if the President orders a renegotiation which makes cosmetic changes while maintaining the basic assumptions of the Draft Convention, no victory will have been won. The treaty is based on dangerous assumptions, and any new treaty incorporating the same assumptions would be equally unacceptable.

This treaty would destroy the American seabed mining industry. It would seriously jeopardize our national security by cutting off our access to strategically vital minerals. It would provide a strong impetus for other such treaties, such as one recently put forward by the United Nations to deal with space exploration. The treaty is radically opposed to every principle of free enterprise, decentralization and self-development that this Administration has ever enunciated. It deserves to be torpedoed.

THE STATE OF THE UNION—ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 97-133)

The PRESIDENT. Mr. Speaker, Mr. President, distinguished Members of the Congress, honored guests, and fellow citizens.

Today marks my first State of the Union address to you, a constitutional duty as old as our Republic itself.

President Washington began this tradition in 1790 after reminding the Nation that the destiny of self-government and the preservation of the sacred fire of liberty is "finally staked on the experiment entrusted to the hands of the American people." For our friends in the press, who place a high premium on accuracy, let me say: I did not actually hear George Washington say that, but it is a matter of historic record.

But from this podium, Winston Churchill asked the free world to stand together against the onslaught of aggression. Franklin Delano Roosevelt spoke of a day of infamy and summoned a nation to arms. Douglas MacArthur made an unforgettable farewell to a country he had loved and served so well. Dwight Eisenhower reminded us that peace was purchased only at the price of strength and John F. Kennedy spoke of the burden and glory that is freedom.

When I visited this Chamber last year as a newcomer to Washington, critical of past policies which I believe had failed, I proposed a new spirit of partnership between this Congress and this administration and between Washington and our State and local governments.

In forging this new partnership for America we could achieve the oldest hopes of our Republic—prosperity for our Nation, peace for the world, and the blessings of individual liberty for our children and, someday, for all of humanity.

It is my duty to report to you tonight on the progress that we have made in our relations with other nations, on the foundation we have carefully laid for our economic recovery and, finally, on a bold and spirited initiative that I believe can change the face of American Government and make it again the servant of the people.

Seldom have the stakes been higher for America. What we do and say here will make all the difference to autoworkers in Detroit, lumberjacks in the Northwest, steelworkers in Steubenville who are in the unemployment lines, the black teenagers in Newark and Chicago, to hard-pressed farmers and small businessmen, and to millions of everyday Americans who harbor the simple wish of a safe and financially secure future for their children.

To understand the state of the Union, we must look not only at where we are and where we are going but where we have been. The situation at this time last year was truly ominous.

The last decade has seen a series of recessions. There was a recession in 1970, another in 1974, and again in the spring of 1980. Each time, unemployment increased and inflation soon turned up again. We coined the word "stagflation" to describe this.

Government's response to these recessions was to pump up the money supply and increase spending.

In the last 6 months of 1980, as an example, the money supply increased at the fastest rate in postwar history—13 percent. Inflation remained in double digits and government spending increased at an annual rate of 17 percent. Interest rates reached a staggering 21½ percent. There were 8 million unemployed.

Late in 1981, we sank into the present recession, largely because continued high interest rates hurt the auto industry and construction. There was a drop in productivity and the already high unemployment increased.

This time, however, things are different. We have an economic program in place completely different from the artificial quick-fixes of the past. It calls for a reduction of the rate of increase in government spending, and already that rate has been cut nearly in half. But reduced spending alone is not enough. We have just implemented the first and smallest phase of a 3-year tax rate reduction plan designed to stimulate the economy and create jobs.

Already interest rates are down to 15¾ percent, but they must still go lower. Inflation is down from 12.4 to 8.9 percent, and for the month of December it was running at an annualized rate of 5.2 percent.

If we had not acted as we did, things would be far worse for all Americans than they are today. [Applause.]

Inflation, taxes and interest rates would all be higher.

A year ago, Americans' faith in their governmental process was steadily declining. Six out of ten Americans were saying they were pessimistic about their future.

A new kind of defeatism was heard. Some said our domestic problems were uncontrollable, that we had to learn to live with the seemingly endless cycle of high inflation and high unemployment.

There were also pessimistic predictions about the relationship between our Administration and this Congress. It was said we could never work together. Well, those predictions were wrong.

The record is clear, and I believe history will remember this as an era of American renewal; remember this administration as an administration of change, and remember this Congress as a Congress of destiny.

Together, we not only cut the increase in Government spending nearly in half, we brought about the largest tax reductions and the most sweeping changes in our tax structure since the beginning of this century. And because we indexed future taxes to the rate of inflation, we took away Government's built-in profit on inflation and its hidden incentive to grow larger at the expense of American workers.

Together, after 50 years of taking power away from the hands of the people in their States and local communities, we have started returning power and resources to them.

Together, we have cut the growth of new Federal regulations nearly in half. In 1981, there were 23,000 fewer pages in the Federal Register, which lists new regulations, than there were in 1980. [Applause.] By deregulating oil, we have come closer to achieving energy independence and helped bring down the costs of gasoline and heating fuel.

Together, we have created an effective Federal strike force to combat waste and fraud in Government. In just 6 months it has saved the taxpayers more than $2 billion—and it is only getting started.

Together, we have begun to mobilize the private sector—not to duplicate wasteful and discredited Government programs, but to bring thousands of Americans into a volunteer effort to help solve many of America's social problems.

Together, we have begun to restore that margin of military safety that insures peace. Our country's uniform is being worn once again with pride. [Applause.]

Together, we have made a New Beginning, but we have only begun.

No one pretends that the way ahead will be easy. In my Inaugural Address last year, I warned that the "ills we suffer have come upon us over several decades. They will not go away in days, weeks or months, but they will go away * * * because we as Americans have the capacity now, as we've had in the past, to do whatever needs to be done to preserve this last and greatest bastion of freedom." [Applause.]

The economy will face difficult moments in the months ahead. But, the program for economic recovery that is in place will pull the economy out of its slump and put us on the road to prosperity and stable growth by the latter half of this year.

That is why I can report to you tonight that in the near future the state of the Union and the economy will be better—much better—if we summon the strength to continue on the course we have charted.

And so the question: If the fundamentals are in place, what now?

Two things. First, we must understand what is happening at the moment to the economy. Our current problems are not the product of the recovery program that is only just now getting underway, as some would have you believe; they are the inheritance of decades of tax and tax, spend and spend.

Second, because our economic problems are deeply rooted and will not respond to quick political fixes we must stick to our carefully integrated plan for recovery. And that plan is based on four commonsense fundamentals: continued reduction of the growth in Federal spending; preserving the individual and business tax reductions that will stimulate saving and investment; removing unnecessary Federal regulations to spur productivity; and maintaining a healthy dollar and a stable monetary policy—the latter a responsibility of the Federal Reserve System.

The only alternative being offered to this economic program is a return to the policies that gave us a trillion dollar debt, runaway inflation, runaway interest rates and unemployment.

The doubters would have us turn back the clock with tax increases that would offset the personal tax rate reductions already passed by this Congress.

Raise present taxes to cut future deficits, they tell us. Well, I don't believe we should buy that argument. There are too many imponderables for anyone to predict deficits or surpluses several years ahead with any degree of accuracy. The budget in place when I took office had been projected as balanced. It turned out to have one of the biggest deficits in history. Another example of the imponderables that can make deficit projections highly questionable: A change of only one percentage point in unemployment can alter a deficit up or down by some $25 billion.

As it now stands, our forecasts, which we are required by law to make will show major deficits, starting at less than $100 billion and declining, but still too high.

More important, we are making progress with the three keys to reducing deficits: economic growth, lower interest rates, and spending control. The policies we have in place will reduce the deficit steadily, surely and, in time, completely.

Higher taxes would not mean lower deficits. If they did, how would we explain that tax revenues more than doubled just since 1976, yet in that same 6-year period we ran the largest series of deficits in our history? In 1980, tax revenues increased by $54 billion, and in 1980 we had one of our all-time biggest deficits.

Raising taxes won't balance the budget. It will encourage more Government spending and less private investment. Raising taxes will slow economic growth, reduce production, and destroy future jobs, making it more difficult for those without jobs to find them and more likely that those who now have jobs could lose them.

So I will not ask you to try to balance the budget on the backs of the American taxpayers. [Applause.]

I will not seek no tax increases this year and I have no intention of retreating from our basic program of tax relief. [Applause.]

I promised the American people to bring their tax rates down and to keep them down, to provide them incentives to rebuild our economy, to save, to invest in America's future. I will stand by my word. Tonight I am urging the American people: Seize these new opportunities to produce, to save, to invest, and together we will make this economy a mighty engine of freedom, hope and prosperity again. [Applause.]

Now, the budget deficit this year will exceed our earlier expectations. The recession did that. It lowered revenues and increased costs. To some extent, we are also victims of our own success. We have brought inflation down faster than we thought we could. [Applause.]

And in doing this, we have deprived Government of those hidden revenues that occur when inflation pushes people into higher income tax brackets. And the continued high interest rates last year cost the Government about $5 billion more than anticipated.

We must cut out more nonessential Government spending and root out more waste, and we will continue our efforts to reduce the number of employees in the Federal work force by 75,000.

The budget plan I submit to you on February 8 will realize major savings by dismantling the Departments of Energy and Education, and by eliminating ineffective subsidies for business. We will continue to redirect our resources to our two highest budget priorities—a strong national defense to keep America free and at peace, and a reliable safety net of social programs for those who have contributed and those who are in need.

Contrary to some of the wild charges you may have heard, this Administration has not and will not turn its back on America's elderly or America's poor. [Applause.]

Under the new budget, funding for social insurance programs will be more than double the amount spent only 6 years ago.

But it would be foolish to pretend that these or any programs cannot be made more efficient and economical.

The entitlement programs that make up our safety net for the truly needy have worthy goals and many deserving recipients. We will protect them. But there is only one way to see to it that these programs really help those whom they were designed to help, and that is to bring their spiraling costs under control.

Today we face the absurd situation of a Federal budget with three-quarters of its expenditures routinely referred to as "uncontrollable"—and a large part of this goes to entitlement programs.

Committee after committee of this Congress has heard witness after witness describe many of these programs as poorly administered and rife with waste and fraud. Virtually every American who shops in a local supermarket is aware of the daily abuses that take place in the food stamp program—which has grown by 16,000 percent in the last 15 years. Another example is medicare and medicaid—programs with worthy goals but whose costs have increased from $11.2 billion to almost $60 billion, more than five times as much, in just 10 years.

Waste and fraud are serious problems. Back in 1980, Federal investigators testified before one of your committees that "corruption has permeated virtually every area of the medicare and medicaid health care industry." One official said many of the people who are cheating the system were "very confident that nothing was going to happen to them."

Well, something is going to happen. Not only the taxpayers are defrauded—the people with real dependency on these programs are deprived of what they need because available resources are going not to the needy but to the greedy.

The time has come to control the uncontrollable.

In August we made a start. I signed a bill to reduce the growth of these programs by $44 billion over the next 3 years, while at the same time preserving essential services for the truly needy. Shortly you will receive from me a message on further reforms we intend to install—some new, but others long recommended by your own congressional committees. I ask you to help make these savings for the American taxpayer.

The savings we propose in entitlement programs will total some $63 billion over 4 years and will, without affecting social security, go a long way toward bringing Federal spending under control.

But don't be fooled by those who proclaim that spending cuts will deprive the elderly, the needy and the helpless. The Federal Government will still subsidize 95 million meals every day. That is one out of seven of all the meals served in America. Head Start, senior nutrition programs, and child welfare programs will not be cut from the levels we proposed last year. More than one-half billion dollars has been proposed for minority business assistance. And research at the National Institutes of Health will be increased by over $100 million. While meeting all these needs, we intend to plug unwarranted tax loopholes and strengthen the law which requires all large corporations to pay a minimum tax. [Applause.]

I am confident the economic program we have put into operation will protect the needy while it triggers a recovery that will benefit all Americans. It will stimulate the economy, result in increased savings and provide capital for expansion, mortgages for homebuilding, and jobs for the unemployed.

Now that the essentials of that program are in place, our next major undertaking must be a program, just as bold, just as innovative, to make government again accountable to the people, to make our system of federalism work again.

Our citizens feel they have lost control of even the most basic decisions made about the essential services of government, such as schools, welfare, roads, and even garbage collection. They are right.

A maze of interlocking jurisdictions and levels of government confronts average citizens in trying to solve even the simplest of problems. They do not know where to turn for answers, who to hold accountable, who to praise, who to blame, who to vote for or against.

The main reason for this is the overpowering growth of Federal grants-in-aid programs during the past few decades.

In 1960, the Federal Government had 132 categorical grant programs, costing $7 billion. When I took office, there were approximately 500, costing nearly $100 billion—13 programs for energy conservation, 36 for pollution control, 66 for social services, 90 for education. And here, in the Congress, it takes at least 166 committees just to try to keep track of them.

You know and I know that neither the President nor the Congress can properly oversee this jungle of grants-in-aid; indeed, the growth of these grants has led to a distortion in the vital functions of government. As one Democratic Governor put it recently: The national government should be worrying about "arms controls, not potholes." [Applause.]

The growth in these Federal programs has, in the words of one intergovernmental commission, made the Federal Government "more pervasive, more intrusive, more unmanageable, more ineffective, more costly, and above all more unaccountable."

Let us solve this problem with a single bold stroke—the return of some $47 billion in Federal programs to State and local government, together with the means to finance them and a transition period of nearly 10 years to avoid unnecessary disruption.

I will shortly send the Congress a message describing this program. I want to emphasize, however, that its full details will have been worked out only after close consultation with congressional, State, and local officials.

Starting in fiscal 1984, the Federal Government will assume full responsibility for the cost of the rapidly growing medicaid program to go along with its existing responsibility for medicare. As part of a financially equal swap, the States will simultaneously take full responsibility for aid to families with dependent children and food stamps. [Applause.]

This will make welfare less costly and more responsive to genuine need because it will be designed and administered closer to the grassroots and the people it serves.

In 1984, the Federal Government will apply the full proceeds from certain excise taxes to a grassroots trust fund that will belong, in fair shares, to the 50 States. The total amount flowing into this fund will be $28 billion a year.

Over the next four years, the States can use this money in either of two ways. If they want to continue receiving Federal grants in such areas as transportation, education and social services, they can use their trust fund money to pay for the grants or, to the extent they choose to forgo the Federal grant programs, they can use their trust fund money on their own, for those or other purposes. There will be a mandatory passthrough of part of these funds to local governments.

By 1988, the States will be in complete control of over 40 Federal grant programs. The trust fund will start to phase out, eventually to disappear, and the excise taxes will be turned over to the States. They can then preserve, lower or raise taxes on their own and fund and manage these programs as they see fit.

In a single stroke, we will be accomplishing a realignment that will end cumbersome administration and spiraling costs at the Federal level while we insure these programs will be more responsive to both the people they are meant to help and the people who pay for them.

Hand in hand with this program to strengthen the discretion and flexibility of State and local governments, we are proposing legislation for an experimental effort to improve and develop our depressed urban areas in the 1980's and 1990's. This legislation will permit States and localities to apply to the Federal Government for designation as urban enterprise zones. A broad range of special economic incentives in the zones will help attract new business, new jobs, new opportunity to America's inner cities and rural towns. Some will say our mission is to save free enterprise. I say we must free enterprise so that, together, we can save America. [Applause.]

Some will also say our States and local communities are not up to the challenge of a new and creative partnership. That might have been true 20 years ago before reforms like reapportionment and the Voting Rights Act, the 10-year extension of which I strongly support. It is no longer true today. This Administration has faith in State and local governments and the constitutional balance envisioned by the Founding Fathers. We also believe in the integrity, decency and sound good sense of grassroots Americans.

Our faith in the American people is reflected in another major endeavor. Our private sector initiatives task force is seeking out successful community models of school, church, business, union, foundation and civic programs that help community needs. Such groups are almost invariably far more efficient than government in running social programs.

We are not asking them to replace discarded and often discredited Government programs dollar for dollar, service for service. We just want to help them perform the good works they choose, and help others to profit by their example. Three hundred eighty-five thousand corporations and private organizations are already working on social programs ranging from drug rehabilitation to job training, and thousands more Americans have written us asking how they can help. The volunteer spirit is still alive and well in America. [Applause.]

Our Nation's long journey toward civil rights for all our citizens—once a source of discord, now a source of pride—must continue with no backsliding or slowing down. We must and shall see that those basic laws that guarantee equal rights are preserved and, when necessary, strengthened. Our concern for equal rights for women is firm and unshakable. We launched a new Task Force on Legal Equity for Women, and a Fifty-States Project that will examine State laws for discriminatory language. And for the first time in our history a woman sits on the highest court in the land. [Applause.]

So, too, the problem of crime—one as real and deadly serious as any in America today—demands that we seek transformation of our legal system, which overly protects the rights of criminals while it leaves society and the innocent victims of crime without justice.

We look forward to the enactment of a responsible Clean Air Act to increase jobs while continuing to improve the quality of our air. We are encouraged by the bipartisan initiative of the House and are hopeful of further progress as the Senate continues its deliberations.

So far I have concentrated largely on domestic matters. To view the state of the Union in perspective, we must not ignore the rest of the world. There is not time tonight for a lengthy treatment of foreign policy—a subject I intend to address in detail in the near future. A few words, however, are in order on the progress we have made over the past year reestablishing respect for our Nation around the globe and some of the challenges and goals we will approach in the year ahead.

At Ottawa and Cancun, I met with leaders of the major industrial powers and developing nations. Some of those I met were a little surprised that I did not apologize for America's wealth. Instead I spoke of the strength of the free marketplace system and how that system could help them realize their aspirations for economic development and political freedom. I believe lasting friendships were made and the foundation was laid for future cooperation.

In the vital region of the Caribbean Basin, we are developing a program of aid, trade and investment incentives to promote self-sustaining growth and a better, more secure life for our neighbors to the south. Toward those who would export terrorism and subversion in the Caribbean and elsewhere, especially Cuba and Libya, we will act with firmness.

Our foreign policy is a policy of strength, fairness and balance. By restoring America's military credibility, by pursuing peace at the negotiating table wherever both sides are willing to sit down in good faith, and by regaining the respect of America's allies and adversaries alike, we have strengthened our country's position as a force for peace and progress in the world.

When action is called for, we are taking it. Our sanctions against the military dictatorship that has attempted to crush human rights in Poland—and against the Soviet regime behind that military dictatorship—clearly demonstrated to the world that America will not conduct "business as usual" with the forces of oppression. [Applause.]

If the events in Poland continue to deteriorate, further measures will follow.

Let me also note that private American groups have taken the lead in making January 30 a day of solidarity with the people of Poland—so, too, the European Parliament has called for March 21 to be an international day of support for Afghanistan. I urge all peace-loving peoples to join together on those days, to raise their voices, to speak and pray for freedom.

Meantime, we are working for reduction of arms and military activities. As I announced in my address to the Nation last November 18, we have proposed to the Soviet Union a far-reaching agenda for mutual reduction of military forces and have already initiated negotiations with them in Geneva on intermediate range nuclear forces.

In these talks, it is essential that we negotiate from a position of strength. There must be a real incentive for the Soviets to take these talks seriously. This requires that we rebuild our defenses.

In the last decade, while we sought the moderation of Soviet power through a process of restraint and accommodation, the Soviets engaged in an unrelenting build-up of their military forces.

The protection of our national security has required that we undertake a substantial program to enhance our military forces.

We have not neglected to strengthen our traditional alliances in Europe and Asia, or to develop key relationships without partners in the Middle East and other countries.

Building a more peaceful world requires a sound strategy and the national resolve to back it up. When radical forces threaten our friends, when economic misfortune creates conditions of instability, when strategically vital parts of the world fall under the shadow of Soviet power, our response can make the difference between peaceful change or disorder and violence. That is why we have laid such stress not only on our own defense, but on our vital foreign assistance program. Your recent passage of the foreign assistance act sent a signal to the world that America will not shrink from making the investments necessary for both peace and security. Our foreign policy must be rooted in realism, not naivete or self-delusion.

A recognition of what the Soviet empire is about is the starting point. Winston Churchill, in negotiating with the Soviets, observed that they respect only strength and resolve in their dealings with other nations.

That is why we have moved to reconstruct our national defenses. We intend to keep the peace—we will also keep our freedom. [Applause.]

We have made pledges of a new frankness in our public statements and worldwide broadcasts. In the face of a climate of falsehood and misinformation, we have promised the world a season of truth—the truth of our great civilized ideas: individual liberty, representative government, the rule of law under God.

We have never needed walls or mine fields or barbwire to keep our people in. Nor do we declare martial law to keep our people from voting for the kind of government they want.

Yes, we have our problems. Yes, we are in a time of recession. And it is true, there is no quick fix, as I said, to instantly end the tragic pain of unemployment. But we will end it. The process has already begun and we will see its effect as the year goes on.

We speak with pride and admiration of that little band of Americans who overcame insuperable odds to set this Nation on course 200 years ago. But our glory did not end with them—Americans ever since have emulated their deeds.

We don't have to turn to our history books for heroes. They are all around us. One who sits among you here tonight epitomized that heroism at the end of the longest imprisonment ever inflicted on men of our Armed Forces. Who will ever forget that night when we waited for television to bring us the scene of that first plane landing at Clark Field in the Philippines—bringing our POW's home? The plane door opened and Jeremiah Denton came slowly down the ramp. He caught sight of our flag, saluted, and said, "God bless America," and then thanked us for bringing him home. [Applause.]

Just 2 weeks ago, in the midst of a terrible tragedy on the Potomac, we saw again the spirit of American heroism at its finest, the heroism of dedicated rescue workers saving crash victims from icy waters. We saw the heroism of one of our young Government employees, Lenny Skutnik, who, when he saw a woman lose her grip on the helicopter line, dived into the water and dragged her to safety. [Applause.]

And then there are countless quiet, everyday heroes of American life—parents who sacrifice long and hard so their children will know a better life than they have known; church and civic volunteers who help to feed, clothe, nurse and teach the needy; millions who have made our Nation, and our Nation's destiny, so very special—unsung heroes who may not have realized their own dreams themselves but who then reinvest those dreams in their children.

Don't let anyone tell you that America's best days are behind her, that the American spirit has been vanquished. We have seen it triumph too often in our lives to stop believing in it now. [Applause.]

One hundred and twenty years ago, the greatest of all our Presidents delivered his second state of the Union message in this Chamber. "We cannot escape history," Abraham Lincoln warned. "We of this Congress and this administration will be remembered in spite of ourselves." The "trial through which we pass will light us down in honor or dishonor to the latest generation."

That President and the Congress did not fail the American people. Together, they weathered the storm and preserved the Union.

Let it be said of us that we, too, did not fail; that we, too, worked together to bring America through difficult times. Let us so conduct ourselves that two centuries from now, another Congress and another President, meeting in this Chamber as we are meeting, will speak of us with pride, saying that we met the test and preserved for them in their day the sacred flame of liberty—this last, best hope of man on Earth.

God bless you, and thank you.

[Applause, the Members rising.]

SENATE—Tuesday, January 26, 1982

(Legislative day of Monday, January 25, 1982)

The Senate met at 8:15 p.m., and was called to order by the President pro tempore (Mr. THURMOND).

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, LL.D., D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray.

Almighty God, God of justice and truth, this session of Congress opens in an election year. As political campaigns grow in intensity, cynicism which corrodes the democratic processes will increase. Dear God, help those who run for office to refrain from doing that which feeds cynicism. And help those who are safe until the next election to do all in their power to avoid that which justifies cynicism. Grant, O God, that the actions and decisions of the Senate in the next 10 months will honor Thee, reflect justice and truth for the common good.

Bless, O Lord, the members of the press who take seriously their mandate that the people may be adequately informed so the democratic process will work. Strengthen them in their resolve; sensitize them to the fierce power of words to build up or destroy. Help them to refrain from sowing seeds of cynicism. Make them wise in the use of the awesome power they possess. Somehow, Lord God, help politicians, press and people to be united in commitment to that which is right for our Nation and the world.

We pray for the President as he addresses the joint session, that his message will inspire national unity and purpose; and for the Congress, that its response will implement the finest and best for all peoples.

And, our Father, we remember Senator WILLIAMS at this time and commend him to Your loving care.

In the name of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Amen.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. LUGAR:

S. 2016. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to provide generally that benefits thereunder may be paid to aliens only after they have been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence, and to impose further restrictions on the right of any alien in a foreign country to receive such benefits; to the Committee on Finance.

PAYMENT OF SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS TO ALIENS

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, today, after consultation with my friend, the Congressman from Ohio, Mr. WEBER, with a deep concern for the future of the social security system and our senior citizens, and in the belief that this Congress must start to help social security along the road to solvency, I am introducing legislation to restrict the payment of social security benefits to nonresident aliens.

At the present time we are paying about $1 billion each year in social security to people living outside the United States. It is estimated that 70 percent of these recipients are aliens. These people have all previously worked in the United States and have paid into the social security system. But then they have left the country, in most cases to return to their homeland. Some of these recipients have paid very little into social security.

Consider just four of the most extreme examples of actual cases of payment/benefit ratios to some foreign recipients:

Case 1: Paid in $25; benefits paid to date $11,000.

Case 2: Paid in $161; benefits paid to date $31,000.

Case 3: Paid in $50; benefits paid to date $13,000.

Case 4: Paid in $397; benefits paid to date $42,000.

I cannot believe that we can any longer afford to drain the social security system of funds to support aliens living outside our country. The purpose of social security is to provide a retirement benefit to assure that the elderly who live in our country can live with dignity.

Many foreigners, because of the lower standard of living in their mother country, can live in comparative luxury by going home and collecting social security benefits.

I believe that it is a vital first step to the recovery of the social security system to remove from eligibility those noncitizens who live and work in the United States temporarily and then return to their homelands, no longer to support and produce in the United States, only to drain the social security system of benefits for our elderly.

The General Accounting Office has estimated that this measure could save as much as $700 million a year. The bill pays back to those people what they have paid into the system, but no more.

There are serious problems with social security that endanger the ability of the Government to live up to the commitment to our elderly and retired. In order to preserve their benefits, we must take the first step. The time for action is now. This bill represents that first, positive step toward this goal that we share.

A general summary of the key points of the bill are:

First, only those aliens admitted as lawful residents to the United States, of our trusts and territories, by the Attorney General of the United States, may receive social security benefits.

Second, nonresident aliens are further restricted from receiving social security benefits by striking the 40-quarter test exemption.

Third, nonresident aliens may only receive benefits up to the amount of social security taxes they have paid into the system.

Fourth, to curb abuse by paper adoptions and the common May-December marriages as are frequent overseas, derivative benefits will not be paid to surviving dependents unless the dependency relationship existed prior to the primary beneficiary's 50th birthday.

Fifth, nonresident aliens who are receiving their benefits as a payback of their contributions will receive their benefits according to the established rules of eligibility as determined by social security.

Sixth, all U.S. citizens and nationals, at home or abroad, and all resident aliens are not affected by the enactment of this bill.

Social security is intended to take care of persons living in America. At this time of a failing social security system, we cannot allow social security to continue as a worldwide pension system for noncitizens no longer living in this country.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 202(t)(1) of the Social Security Act is amended to read as follows:

"(1)(A) Notwithstanding any other provisions of this title (but subject to subparagraphs (B) through (F) of this paragraph), no monthly benefit shall be paid under this section or section 223 for any month to any individual who is not a citizen or national of the United States, if such individual—

"(i) has not been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence, or

"(ii) is outside the United States; and no monthly benefits shall be paid to any person for any month under this section or section 223 on the basis of the wages and self-employment income of an individual who (without regard to subparagraph (E)) is himself prevented by the preceding provisions of this subparagraph from receiving a benefit for that month.

"(B) Subparagraph (A)(i) shall not apply with respect to any individual within the United States if the benefit involved is payable to such individual as the dependent or survivor of a citizen or national of the United States, or as the dependent or survivor of an alien lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence.

By Mrs. HAWKINS:

S. 2017. A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to conduct a study of handgun bullets manufactured in or imported into the United States, to determine which bullets have the capacity to penetrate bulletproof vests commonly used by law enforcement officers; to the Committee on Finance.

LAW ENFORCEMENT OFFICERS' PROTECTION ACT OF 1982

● Mrs. HAWKINS. Mr. President, until "killer bullets" are banned from public sale, law enforcement officers and public officials will be vulnerable to assassins who acquire them since these bullets can penetrate otherwise bulletproof vests. For that reason, I am introducing today a bill which calls for a study to determine which handgun bullets can penetrate vests currently in use by law enforcement officers. A companion bill already has been introduced in the House of Representatives by Congressman MARIO BIAGGI. As a former New York City police officer, Representative BIAGGI knows firsthand the dangers involved.

To date, there is no exhaustive list of handgun bullets which have such devastating and penetrating power. The purpose of this bill is to change that by authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make three determinations: First, determine the capacity of such vests to protect against bullets in general; second, determine which bullets are now available to the American public which can penetrate protective vests; finally, determine the effectiveness of laws restricting the availability of handgun bullets which can penetrate protective vests.

It is imperative that "cop killer" bullets be identified as soon as possible. Right now "killer bullets" pose a serious threat to all law enforcement officers and public officials. Furthermore, funds nationwide have been invested to provide enforcement officers with bulletproof vests. In fact, these vests are credited with saving at least 400 lives of law enforcement officers annually. If "killer bullets" remain available to the public, our hard-won progress to protect those who defend us from crime will be lost. The public will lose in other ways also. Dangerous criminals will escape more frequently since our failure to act will force law enforcement officials to take less aggressive action out of self-defense. In addition, controversial public officials will present their views in public less frequently. These are costs that society need not absorb.

Finally, Mr. President, this issue should be judged independently from efforts to impose further gun control. I, for one, believe we have gone too far already in restricting the rights of citizens to protect themselves with firearms. As Representative BIAGGI pointed out, this is a case of "gun abuse" rather than gun control. However, it is my sincere hope we can begin this study, identify bullets which penetrate protective vests, and ban those that do.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include at the end of my remarks an article which appeared in the Washington Post entitled "New Bullets for Handguns Pierce Armor, and Police Want a Ban," along with a copy of my proposed bill.

There being no objection, the bill and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2017

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Law Enforcement Officers' Protection Act of 1981".

FINDINGS AND POLICY

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the protection of our Nation's law enforcement officers is essential if we are to continue to have a highly qualified crime prevention force,

(2) three hundred and seventy-nine law enforcement officers were killed with handguns between 1974 and 1978, which represents 68 per centum of all the law enforcement officers killed in that period,

(3) the law enforcement community is increasingly dependent on bulletproof vests for protection against handgun bullets,

(4) law enforcement officers are seriously threatened by the use of certain handgun bullets which are available to the public and capable of penetrating bulletproof vests,

(5) available information regarding both the capacity of various handgun bullets to penetrate bulletproof vests and the risk that the availability and use of such bullets pose to law enforcement officers is not adequate to assist law enforcement officers, States, and the Federal Government to take appropriate action to reduce such risk,

(6) the law enforcement community has expressed deep concern about such risk, and

(7) a study to determine the capacity of handgun bullets to penetrate bulletproof vests will provide information which may lead to saving the lives of law enforcement officers.

(b) It is the policy of the United States to determine the risk posed to law enforcement officers by the availability and use of handgun bullets which have the capacity to penetrate bulletproof vests, so that the Congress can take appropriate action to reduce such risk.

STUDY OF HANDGUN BULLETS

SEC. 3. The Secretary or his designee shall conduct a study to determine the capacity of handgun bullets to penetrate bulletproof vests and the risk posed to law enforcement officers by the availability and use of handgun bullets. Such study shall include a determination of—

(1) which handgun bullets currently available to the public through importation, manufacture, sale, or other transfer are capable of penetrating bulletproof vests commonly used by law enforcement officers,

(2) the capacity of such bulletproof vests to withstand handgun bullets, and

(3) the effectiveness of any provision of law which restricts the availability to the public of handgun bullets which have the capacity to penetrate bulletproof vests commonly used by law enforcement officers.

REPORT OF STUDY

SEC. 4. The Secretary shall submit a report to the President and to each House of the Congress, not later than one year after the date on which funds are first made available to carry out this Act, containing a detailed statement of the findings and conclusions of the study required in section 3, and the recommendations of the Secretary regarding appropriate Federal and State legislation based on such findings and conclusions.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 5. For purposes of this Act—

(1) the term "bullet" means a round or elongated missile designed to be fired from a firearm,

(2) the term "bulletproof vest" means any commercially available, soft, lightweight body armor,

(3) the term "handgun" means any firearm which has a short stock and which is designed to be fired by the use of a single hand, and

(4) the term "Secretary" means the Secretary of the Treasury.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 6. There is authorized to be appropriated $500,000 to carry out the provisions of this Act.

NEW BULLETS FOR HANDGUNS PIERCE ARMOR, AND POLICE WANT A BAN

(By Terrance W. McGarry)

LOS ANGELES.—Police organizations and their allies in Congress and at least two state legislatures are trying to outlaw the apple green bullets they call "cop-killers."

The bullets, available in all pistol calibers, easily punch through "bullet-proof" vests worn mainly by officers and politicians.

The Kevlar fabric vests, lightweight but strong enough to halt almost all pistol bullets, have proved a boon to police officers and are becoming increasingly common.

But "these frightening bullets eliminate all protection for police officers and public officials who must fear assassination," said California Assemblyman Tom Banes, who plans to introduce a bill when the state legislature reconvenes this month, outlawing the manufacture, possession or sale of the bullets in California. In New York, state Sen. John Calandra has introduced a similar bill that he expects will be approved.

"The problem is, there is no other use for these bullets" other than shooting police officers and assassinating politicians, said Rep. Mario Biaggi (D-N.Y.), who has been trying to outlaw the bullets on the federal level.

Between 1975 and 1978, the latest year for which statistics are available but before the vests became as common as they are now, the vests saved the lives of 250 of the 255 police officers wearing them who were shot in gun battles, Biaggi said. The other five were hit in the head or other unprotected areas.

He has a bill pending before a House committee to commission a study "to identify all such bullets so that ultimately we can enact laws to ban their manufacture and sale," said his spokesman, Bob Blancato.

"If I were an officer on the street, I'd be very fearful of these things," said the International Union of Police Association's West Coast representative, San Francisco officer Gerald Crowley, who witnessed tests of the bullets.

In those tests, he said, "A vest was folded so that it presented four times the normal thickness of Kevlar. A .357-magnum from a distance of 20 feet went through all four layers of the vest and five big city telephone directories behind it."

To date, no police officer or other Kevlar-protected person has been shot with the special bullets, and authorities hope to get the ammunition off the market before there is such a shooting.

Biaggi said he first heard about the armor-piercing bullets "about two years ago from the New York City Patrolmen's Benevolent Association."

Investigators say there are several bullets with similar characteristics, but the best known is the KTW.

It was developed by a doctor and two peace officers in Lorain, Ohio, a shipbuilding town on the shore of Lake Erie.

The bronze bullet, semi-pointed in shape, is coated with Teflon. Its hardness and shape give it better penetration and the Teflon "slides" it through otherwise impenetrable surfaces.

KTW is named for Dr. J. P. Kopsch, Dan Turcus and Don Ward. Kopsch, the former coroner, now runs the company. Turcus recalled the origin of the bullet:

"We had a shootout in Lorain and the police bullets were just bouncing off the guy's car while he was shooting back at us.

"Dr. Kopsch said he had seen too many shooting cases as a coroner in which the police were at a disadvantage. We got to talking about it and decided policemen should have a bullet that gave them an edge, something they could fire from the pistols they already had and that would shoot right through a car.

"We experimented for years and came up with a material that was twice as dense as lead. The Teflon coating added about 20 percent more penetration—they just slide right through.

"We didn't want to manufacture it, really. We tried to sell it to the U.S. military but they weren't interested.

"Most of our production, when I was with the company, was sold to foreign governments for their police forces, I seem to recall. I heard the East Germans were trying to copy it."

The bullet's developers said they never sold the bullets to civilians, but critics disagree. At least one civilian, who asked not to be identified, told UPI he was able to obtain a large number of the bullets by mail from a California dealer, with no identification required. The dealer denied it, but the source has a collection of KTW bullets.

"You're supposed to be a law enforcement officer to buy these things, the KTW people say, but there simply is no effective enforcement of that restriction," said Craig Floyd, an aide to Biaggi.

"We've contacted law enforcement departments all over the country and they say they have no use for them because they're so dangerous. They go right through darn near anything—people, cars, walls—and hit other things, like a bystander some distance away. Police won't use them because you can't tell where they'll wind up."

A difficulty in drawing up federal legislation, Floyd said, "is that we have heard there are other bullets, besides the KTW, which could also penetrate a Kevlar vest. That restricts our ability to ban the KTW alone, which is why we want a federal study to identify all such bullets."●

SENATE RESOLUTION 284—RESOLUTION RELATING TO MINIMUM TAX ON CORPORATIONS

Mr. GRASSLEY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

S. RES. 284

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Secretary of the Treasury explore the possibility of imposing on corporations a minimum alternative tax on tax preferences.

MINIMUM TAX ON CORPORATIONS

● Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I would like to submit a sense of the Senate resolution asking the Department of Treasury to study the feasibility of instituting an alternative minimum tax on preference items for corporations.

The alternative minimum tax on preferences for individuals applies generally to those taxpayers with large amounts of itemized deductions. This tax is imposed in addition to regular income tax. This tax applies to adjusted itemized deductions and capital gains of taxpayers if it results in a higher tax than the taxpayer would be liable for using the standard methods for computing tax liability.

Items of tax preference are generally those items which are either not subject to taxation because of temporary exclusion from gross income or because of accelerated depreciation or not subject to full taxation because of certain deductions or a special tax rate.

In my view an alternative minimum tax on preference items for corporations deserves study. Congress has come under great criticism for enacting the controversial leasing provisions which permit a corporation to sell tax benefits it cannot use to a corporation which may use them. This provision was inserted in the law to permit corporations in a loss position to take advantage of the benefits of accelerated depreciation. It was also added to prevent the swallow-up of unprofitable companies by other more profitable concerns hungry for tax benefits. While many people feel the company selling or more accurately leasing the tax benefits should be permitted to gain the advantages of the accelerated cost recovery system, few of us are sympathetic to the company acquiring the leasing benefits to net out their tax liability. For that reason, an alternative minimum corporate tax putting a floor on the amount of tax all corporations pay deserves our earnest consideration. Congress enacted the accelerated cost recovery system to encourage business to retool and embark upon productive enterprise, we did not enact this system with the intent of permitting corporations to absolve themselves of their tax liability.

For that reason, I am asking the Department of Treasury to seriously consider a proposal of this nature and I am asking my colleagues to support this legislative endeavor by joining me as co-sponsors of this measure. ●

For further information regarding this hearing you may wish to contact Mr. Tony Bevinetto of the committee staff at 224-5161.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON FEDERAL EXPENDITURES, RESEARCH, AND RULES

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, on Tuesday, February 2, 1982, the Subcommittee on Federal Expenditures, Research, and Rules will hold a hearing on the Federal procurement work force. The hearing is scheduled to begin at 9 a.m. and is to be held in room 3302 of the Dirksen Senate Office Building.

The subcommittee has invited witnesses to provide testimony on the following issues: First, demography and role of the work force in the existing procurement system; second, ongoing executive branch efforts to enhance the training and professionalism of the work force; third, the contributions being made by universities, professional associations, and other private sector resources; and fourth, the impact of the work force on the relations between the Government and its contractors. In the months ahead, this subcommittee, and the Congress, will be considering the administration's proposal for a uniform Federal procurement system. We will be working toward a simplified, deregulated system which encourages more participation by businesses large and small within a statutory framework that fosters more competition for the Government's business.

The subcommittee encourages the submission of written testimony by any interested person. Written submissions should be addressed to the Subcommittee on Federal Expenditures, Research, and Rules, 128 C. Street NE., room 44, Washington, D.C. 20510. For additional information, interested persons should contact Pat Otto, chief clerk of the subcommittee, or its procurement counsel, William B. Montalto, at (202) 224-0211.

Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, I wish to announce that the Committee on Rules and Administration will hold a meeting on Tuesday, February 2, 1982, at 10 a.m. in room 301 Russell Senate Office Building. The purpose of the meeting is to receive testimony from Senators and others on implementation of the postal patron provisions of Public Law 97-69 (S. 1224), relating to the use of the frank.

As this matter relates directly to each Senator's ability to communicate with his or her constituents, I encourage all Senators to express their opinion on the postal patron program to the Rules Committee. Any Senator wishing to testify or to submit a statement for the record should contact Carole Blessington of the Rules Committee staff on extension 4-0278.

At this point I ask unanimous consent that my letter and accompanying materials concerning postal patron mailings that were sent on December 18, 1981, to all Senators be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON RULES AND ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D.C., December 18, 1981.

DEAR SENATOR: On October 26, 1981, President Reagan signed into law S. 1224 (P.L. 97-69), relating to changes in use of the frank.

One of the provisions of Public Law 97-69 extends to Senators the use of simplified forms of address, or postal patron mailings. Senate report 97-155, which accompanied S. 1224, cites four areas for potential cost-savings to the Senate:

(1) Postal patron mail rates are lower.

(2) With the use of postal patron addresses, there is no returned mail. Newsletters returned with address corrections by postmaster, cost 25 cents per piece.

(3) Senate Computer Center costs would be reduced if fewer labels were printed.

(4) Staff used to update mailing lists could be freed for other tasks. A fact sheet giving more information on postal patron mailings is attached.

Public Law 97-69 authorizes Senators to use postal patron mailings 120 days after enactment and following the development of appropriate rules and regulations by the Rules Committee.

To assist the Rules Committee in determining what might be an appropriate number of postal patron mailings to authorize per year and to determine the impact on Senate costs, services, space and personnel, we need your assistance in our planning process.

Would you please take the time to answer the attached questionnaire and return it to the Rules Committee as soon as possible.

Thank you.

Sincerely,

CHARLES McC. MATHIAS, Jr.,
Chairman.

FACT SHEET

(1) The use of the postal patron program does not require staff resources to maintain mail files. Postal patron mailings can reach every mailbox in the state or can be targeted by zip code or even by carrier route.

(2) The current level of newsletter production in the Senate is approximately equal to one statewide postal patron mailing to every mailbox in the state per Senator per year.

(3) Elimination of the current system of individualized addresses for newsletters in favor of one statewide postal patron mailing per Senator could result in a net postage savings to the Senate of over $5,000,000 per year (based on maximum participation in the postal patron program vis-a-vis Third Class Bulk Sort).

(4) More than one postal patron mailing per year or even one postal patron mailing plus the current use of individualized addresses for newsletters will require an additional appropriation of funds.

(5) Comparison of postal rates per piece:

[In cents]

	1st class	3d class bulk sort [1]	Postal patron
Base rate	20	9.3	7.9
(Returns) address correction requested	25	25	0
(Returns) undeliverable mail returned (for deletion)	0	10.9	0
Express mail sack surcharge average	1.3	1.3	1.3

[1] Third class bulk sort program began Aug. 10, 1981, prior to which all Senate mail went at the first class rate. Currently, over 60 percent of Senate mail qualifies for the 9.3 cents rate.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

100TH ANNIVERSARY OF SAM RAYBURN'S BIRTH

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, earlier this month, on January 6, I traveled to Bonham, Tex., and took part in ceremonies marking the 100th anniversary of Sam Rayburn's birth.

Bonham is Sam Rayburn's hometown and the site of the very impressive Sam Rayburn Library. The Speaker is still remembered with great fondness by the people of Bonham whom he served in the House for over half a century.

I have always felt that Sam Rayburn represented much of what is finest and most noble about our American experience. He symbolized the spirit of commitment, deep personal integrity, and sense of service that is so essential to our democratic, representative form of government.

Sam Rayburn was one of the most effective and respected legislative leaders in the history of America. He was also a close personal friend who taught me a great deal about the House of Representatives when I arrived there as a freshman Congressman from the Rio Grande Valley back in 1948.

I found that one of the most impressive aspects of the ceremonies in Bonham was the degree to which The Speaker touched the lives of those who knew and worked with him. Everyone who was a friend of Sam Rayburn has a special story or antedote that illustrates his warmth as an individual and his single-minded dedication to public service.

One of the most moving and eloquent remembrances I heard at Bonham was spoken by Lady Bird Johnson who knew and admired Sam Rayburn throughout much of his career. Mrs. Johnson has managed to catch some of the magic of Sam Rayburn, and I ask to have her remarks printed in the RECORD.

REMARKS OF MRS. LYNDON B. JOHNSON AT SAM RAYBURN BIRTHDAY CENTENNIAL

One hundred years! Can it really be that long for a man who is so fresh in the minds of all of us—a man who was the essence of faith in this country and its destiny—optimistic about our future—a man who lived his patriotism.

How comforting it is to me to know that we produced leaders like that. The legacy he left me—left all of us—I think is reassurance about our country and our form of Government. Can it be 21 years since he died?

For the thousands of us who remember him so vividly, he is ever present in the U.S. Capitol. I can still see him walking through the corridors, a brown felt hat on his head, set deep into his broad shoulders, taking an envelope out of his pocket and making a note on it if someone stopped him. He walked through the Capitol and his district like a man driving a wagon, pulling up the rein to talk.

He had the simple power and honesty of someone who believed in the simple goodness of people, from the day he set foot in the Capitol in 1913 he never flinched from the word "Government." In his maiden speech to the House of Representatives, he made that clear:

"It is now my sole purpose here to enact such wise and just laws that our common country will be a happy and more prosperous country."

And for 48 years he labored for that purpose, breaking the stranglehold of the greedy, with the Holding Company Act, and whole staccato of new deal legislation that lifted the Nation out of the depression and got it moving.

When I came as a young bride to Washington, Lyndon already knew Mr. Sam. He had told me of the first time he had met him.

Lyndon was secretary to Congressman Kleberg and was very sick in a Washington hospital. Suddenly, there in the doorway was Mr. Rayburn saying: "Son, I am an old friend of your father's and I just wanted to drop by and see how you are." His dealings with people were always just that kind and direct.

Years later, after Pearl Harbor, when Nellie Connally and I were saying goodbye to our husbands as they left for the Pacific, the Speaker was there with us at the depot. As the train pulled out (and we were feeling so forlorn) the Speaker turned to us and said, "Now girls, we're going out and get the best dinner in town."

Years later, Lyndon and Mr. Sam and I were riding through the fall foliage of Virginia on a Sunday afternoon. Suddenly we came out on a slope to a breathtaking view of that great white glistening U.S. Capitol. He said with pride: "Lady Bird, how do you like my Capitol?" He felt intensely possessive about that Capitol and all that happened there. He believed that building must belong to every American in a very personal way.

I came to Boham when he proudly dedicated the Sam Rayburn Library. There are a thousand stories in that Library, a thousand lessons in Government for students of History, for writers, and just plain Americans. The library is filled with rich resources to be mined—stories of our Nation's heartaches and triumphs covering 48 years—about a fourth of the Nation's lifetime—covering eight Presidents—from Woodrow Wilson to John F. Kennedy

I remember how impressed Lyndon was with the Speaker's collection of the Congressional Record, dating back to the First Congress in 1798. Other than the Library of Congress, this library in Bonham has the only complete set in the Nation.

I came back to Bonham the day he died in 1961 with Lyndon and met the people of Texas' Old Fourth—the beloved district of that beloved man—as they came to pay their respects at that white wooden farm house that sits here on the black, waxy farm land of north Texas.

I remember how rough and worn were the hands—the hard working hands—hands of character—and how tender their voices when they spoke of "Sammy" or "the Speaker". Many had known him as a boy and had sent him to Austin and then to Washington. He made Government come alive and serve them.

This morning, I stood on the steps of his "Athens on the hill"—his library looking west to the Cotton Gin and the Willow Wild Cemetery. There Sam Rayburn is buried—in the family plot with eight of his brothers and sisters. Each grave has a small grey granit marker—all the same. His own marker reads simply "Mr. Sam (1882-1961)." A small gavel is etched in the stone.

I used to think it needed to say a lot more, at least a line that gave the essence of him—"He voted for the folks"—but Sam Rayburn was a man who needs no embellishment.●

AMENDMENT OF TAX LEASING PROVISIONS OF 1981 TAX CUT

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President on January 25, I introduced legislation to sunset the tax leasing provisions of the 1981 Tax Act on September 30, 1982.

Mr. President, these new rules, which permit corporations to sell tax breaks to each other, have drawn a lot of deserved criticism over the past few months. A number of newspaper editors, public officials, and Members of Congress have seized the opportunity to denounce this provision as a half-baked idea which allows large profitable companies to take investment credits and accelerated deductions, leaving the small umprofitable companies to nibble at the leftovers.

The authors of this provision, pointed out the likelihood that a large number of companies would be unable to take advantage of new investment incentives. They further argued that, without this provision, a taxable company might be encouraged to acquire a company with no taxable income solely for the purpose of employing its unused tax credits.

While there may have been reasonable basis for proposing these new rules, in practice they simply have not worked.

Recent experience reveals that for the most part only the largest corporations have taken advantage of this provision. Since one of the primary justifications of new law was that it would help smaller companies otherwise unable to invest in new equipment, the predominant use of this system by large corporations is disturbing.

In addition, considerable doubt remains as to how much benefit from the leasing arrangement is actually reaching the intended beneficiary—the nonprofitable company. Some have claimed that as much as 80 percent of the benefits are siphoned off by the taxable corporation and intermediaries, leaving only 20 percent of the benefits to the unprofitable company. A more reasonable estimate, based or recently completed leasing arrangements as a basis for judgment would be that about two-thirds of the benefits are finally realized by the unprofitable company. Even this division of benefits would represent an inefficient means of helping nonprofitable companies.

The most compelling reason for putting aside this new provision is its prohibitive expense. Even conservative estimates place its cost to the Federal Treasury for fiscal year 1981-86 at $29.1 billion. Many analysts believe the actual figure will come to twice that amount. In view of the deficits now anticipated for those years, an imperfect arrangement like this one is an unaffordable luxury.

Finally, although these new rules were part of a tax package which was considered by the Senate Finance Committee late last year, they were passed in great haste. Certainly a program of tax advantages worth at least $29.1 billion requires full debate in the Congress, debate that is more thoughtful than last year's.

It may surprise some to learn that tax leasing is not a new addition to the tax code. In fact, the practice of tax leasing has been in use since the birth of the investment tax credit. These old rules, devised in 1962, had the effect of limiting the frequency of the leasing arrangements.

Last year's legislation requires that all parties to a leasing arrangement file pertinent information with the U.S. Treasury. Congress will shortly have before it more detailed data with which to evaluate the merits of this provision.

My bill would open the debate on the entire scope of this issue, forcing Congress to determine whether leasing ought to be restricted in the manner prescribed by the old rules or whether it ought to be terminated altogether.

My bill sets the date for the expiration of this provision as September 30, 1982. Without penalizing those companies who have already made long-term capital commitments on the basis of new law, it would leave no doubt as to the future of these new rules.

Most importantly, it will give the Senate Finance Committee ample opportunity to review the entire area of tax leasing, with the most accurate information available.

Mr. President, I believe that every tax provision should bear the burden of proving its merit under an established time frame. Since we have not yet chosen to apply the "sunset" principle to the tax code generally, perhaps we can try it on this one section. Unless leasing can be justified by a year's experience and passed again in the light of day, it should be terminated.●

A TRIBUTE TO DANIEL WEBSTER

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, January 18, 1982, marked the 200th anniversary of the birth of Daniel Webster of New Hampshire, an American who made his imprint on this country's history through his great skills as an orator, lawyer, and statesman. Too often, we forget the contributions of Americans of earlier generations, and I feel that it is important to take this opportunity to remember and honor this great American.

Daniel Webster was born in Salisbury, N.H., the son of an early revolutionary leader. Fortified by his father's steady encouragement, he attended Phillips Exeter Academy and Dartmouth College in New Hampshire. Subsequently, he studied law and, after a brief period of teaching to support his brother's education, began to practice law in Portsmouth, N.H. It was during his 9 years in Portsmouth that Webster became more and more drawn into politics. He spoke often of his devotion to the bonds of our Federal Union and was especially articulate on economics and public finance, arguing diligently for the protection of New England's shipping industries. Using his superior forensic abilities, he sought to arouse those inclined to sit still and sigh at the depravity of the times. He represented Massachusetts in Congress beginning in 1812, and began his long career in the U.S. Senate in 1827.

Although Webster frequently found himself in opposition to the administration he worked with, he was a patriot, not a partisan, deciding each measure on its merits and not its point of origin. He was admired as a practical statesman, recognizing concession as a method to resolving warring views. When criticizing measures, he argued constructively, offering alternative ideas and plans. It was during his term as Senator that he came to be known as defender of the Constitution. Serving as Secretary of State under Presidents Harrison and Tyler, he demonstrated his outstanding characteristics of tact and dignity in resolving many delicate diplomatic tangles.

While conducting his political career, Webster continued to practice law, earning broad recognition as a gifted and committed lawyer. He was often retained by the Supreme Court, arguing brilliantly in cases that involved grave constitutional issues, including McCulloch against Maryland, Gibbons against Ogden, and Osborn against Bank of the United States.

Daniel Webster was a man of foresight, dedication, and action. His zeal and perseverance not only left a lasting impression on early 19th century America but have also inspired Americans ever since. I am proud to have the use of this distinguished American's desk here on the Senate floor.●

THE IMPACT OF REGULATORY REFORM ACT ON THE INDEPENDENCE OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, last week I sent a letter to President Reagan expressing my concern over the potential impact of the pending Regulatory Reform Act (S. 1080) on the independence of the Federal Reserve Board and other independent agencies. Inasmuch as President Reagan had stressed the autonomy of the Federal Reserve Board in his press conference and stated that the policy of his administration toward the Agency is one of neutrality, I called on the President to support an amendment that I intend to offer to S. 1080 to maintain the independence of the Fed and other similar agencies such as the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, and the Federal Election Commission. I would request that a copy of that letter be included in the RECORD following my remarks. I submit for the RECORD a copy of a letter from Federal Reserve Board Chairman Volcker expressing concern regarding the executive oversight provisions of S. 1080.

My amendment, which I hope to introduce this week, will be similar in thrust to that which was unanimously adopted by the Governmental Affairs Committee when it reported S. 1080.

The letters follow:

COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS, SUBCOMMITTEE ON ENERGY, NUCLEAR PROLIFERATION, AND GOVERNMENT PROCESSES,
Washington, D.C., January 21, 1982.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Your remarks at your press conference on Tuesday and subsequent statements by White House spokesmen to the press indicated that in your view the Federal Reserve Board is entirely "autonomous" and that the policy of your Administration towards the Fed is one of "neutrality".

At the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee mark-up of the Regulatory Reform Act of 1981 (S. 1080) and other negotiations on this legislation, White House spokesmen have expressly indicated, however, that Reagan Administration policy is to obtain and exercise greatly increased authority over the Federal Reserve Board and other independent regulatory agencies' rulemaking activities. In essence the authority sought, contained in the Executive Oversight provisions of the bill (section 624), would require the Federal Reserve Board and these other agencies to submit all their major rules to the Office of Management and Budget for screening, prior to issuance in proposed or final form. This practice has already been implemented with respect to Executive Branch agencies pursuant to your Executive Order on Regulatory Relief (E. O. 12291) and I understand that under this authority OMB has already rejected numerous pending regulations.

Chairman Volcker, and the heads of many other independent agencies, have strongly objected to this proposed change in their rulemaking practices as a significant intrusion on their independence of action. In Chairman Volcker's words to the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee Chairman Roth, commenting on S. 1080:

"There is an additional reason to be concerned about the provisions for executive oversight in the rulemaking process, particularly with respect to the operations of the Federal Reserve system. As I know you are aware, Congress created the Federal Reserve System in 1913 as an independent entity in order to emphasize the insulation of the credit regulation process from the function of financing the government. Long experience demonstrates that the separation of these two functions can make a vital contribution to a more stable and effective domestic monetary system. Therefore, I would be particularly concerned about executive oversight as applied to the functions of the Federal Reserve System."

Let me add, that my preliminary inquiries to the Fed indicate that by controlling the agency's rulemaking functions, OMB might be able to have s substantial effect on monetary policy, the center of the Fed's independent sphere of activity.

At the Committee's mark-up I offered an amendment to S. 1080 that would significantly reduce the impact of the bill's Executive Oversight provisions on these independent agencies. The amendment was accepted unanimously. However, for parliamentary reasons it will be necessary for me to re-introduce such an amendment on the Senate floor when the Senate takes up the Regulatory Reform Act next month.

There have been strong indications in the press from OMB officials that the Administration will oppose my amendment. In light of your remarks on Tuesday, and those of White House spokesmen I mentioned earlier, I hope I am correct that these prior OMB statements are erroneous and that the Administration stands behind the continued independence of the Federal Reserve System and that of the other agencies to which Congress has granted independent status.

If such is the case, I would look forward to your support for my amendment to the Regulatory Reform Act when it is addressed by the Senate next month.

Best regards.

Sincerely,

JOHN GLENN.

BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM,
Washington, D.C., September 10, 1981.

Hon. WILLIAM V. ROTH, Jr.,
Chairman, Committee on Governmental Affairs, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN ROTH: I am pleased to submit views regarding the executive oversight provisions in S. 1080, the "Regulatory Reform Act," as you requested in your letter dated July 30, 1981.

The executive oversight provisions of S. 1080 (new section 624 of Title 5 of the United States Code) would authorize the President, or an officer to whom he delegated this authority, to monitor, review, and ensure agency implementation of the "major rule" procedural requirements of S. 1080 (new sections 621 and 622 of Title 5) and to report annually to Congress on agencies' compliance with these requirements. The President's exercise or nonexercise of this oversight authority would not be judicially reviewable.

"Major rule" is defined in S. 1080 as a rule that causes or is likely to cause "an annual effect on the economy of $100 million or more in direct or indirect enforcement and compliance costs"; or likely to result in a substantial increase in costs or prices or cause "significant adverse effects on competition, employment, investment, productivity, innovation, the environment, public health or safety, or the ability of enterprises where principal places of business are in the United States to compete in domestic or export markets," or "other effects that warrant subjecting the rule to a regulatory analysis. . . ."

The "regulatory analysis" that would be required for all major rules must contain a complex, detailed description and comparison of the benefits and costs of the rule, and of reasonable alternatives to the rule, based upon a detailed record. In addition, except where a statute directs otherwise, the analysis must also explain why the benefits of the rule justify its costs, and why the rule is more cost-effective than the alternatives in achieving the objectives of the rule.

Since the executive oversight provisions would apply to implementation of the "major rule" concept, I believe it would be appropriate to review the necessity for adopting this proposal. As I understand it, when the major rule concept applied, it would require the addition to the regulatory process of a series of detailed and complex cost benefit analyses. I am concerned that these new requirements will result in a substantial increase in paperwork, additional costly informational burdens on both the agency involved and the public, judicial challenges, and, most important, lengthy delays in administrative action. It is my judgment that the objectives of regulatory simplification and avoidance of unnecessary regulation would not be accomplished by an additional layer of administrative requirements.

Executive oversight as applied to this "major rule" concept would add still another unnecessary complexity. However, there is an additional reason to be concerned about the provisions for executive oversight in the rulemaking process, particularly with respect to the operations of the Federal Reserve System. As I know you are aware, the Congress created the Federal Reserve System in 1913 as an independent entity in order to emphasize the insulation of the credit regulation process from the function of financing the government. Long experience demonstrates that the separation of these two functions can make a vital contribution to a more stable and effective domestic monetary system. Therefore, I would be particularly concerned about executive oversight as applied to the functions of the Federal Reserve System.

This is not only true because of the broad policy considerations I have just outlined, but also because of the fact that this would run directly counter to one of the major objectives that Congress sought to achieve in creating specialized agencies. The significant mandate that the President would receive under the executive oversight concept to interfere in the regulatory process could significantly defeat the purpose of assuring regulation based on expert judgment on the merits of both general policy and particular cases.

This is not to say, of course, that the regulatory process should not be subject to Congressional scrutiny and to the requirement of the adoption of every step feasible to lighten and simplify the existing regulatory burden as well as the avoidance of unnecessary regulation in the future. These objectives, I wish to reemphasize, can be achieved most efficiently by analysis of individual agency functions rather than through the adoption of new, across-the-board requirements that rigidify and expand regulatory burdens as well as impair basic Congressional policies calling for regulatory independence and expertise through the multiplication of decision-making layers.

I appreciate having had this opportunity to offer these comments on S. 1080.

Sincerely,

PAUL A. VOLCKER.●

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

ARMS CONTROL NEGOTIATIONS

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of my colleagues to an editorial written by Stanley R. Sloan which appeared in the Baltimore Sun on December 18, 1982.

Mr. Sloan's thoughtful piece focuses on possible negotiating strategies and approaches to the Geneva talks with the Soviet Union on reducing intermediate range nuclear arms in Europe. Progress and success in these negotiations can be critically important to our security and the security of our allies in Europe. I hope that our negotiators in Geneva and our policy planners here in Washington are carefully scrutinizing a variety of negotiating strategies and approaches, such as those articulated by Mr. Sloan, which might help provide the necessary framework and environment to achieve a U.S.-Soviet agreement on reduction and limitations on intermediate-range nuclear arms.

The article follows:

[From the Sun, Dec. 18, 1981]

DEADLOCK IS NOT INEVITABLE

(By Stanley R. Sloan)

REDUCING NUCLEAR ARMS IN EUROPE

American and Soviet officials have settled in behind closed doors in Geneva to begin what promises to be a difficult and potentially fruitless attempt to limit nuclear weapons in Europe. According to their respective spokesmen, the two sides opened talks in a "business-like" and "constructive" fashion. But they also began with widely divergent perspectives on the current balance in medium-range nuclear systems and, therefore, on the outcome that would be acceptable to each.

President Reagan announced on November 18 that the United States would seek elimination of all intermediate-range Soviet nuclear missiles in return for cancellation of NATO's decision to deploy 572 new cruise and Pershing II ballistic missiles in Europe. This was the so-called "zero-option." In so doing, the president claimed that the Soviet Union has a 6-to-1 advantage over the United States in intermediate-range nuclear weapons systems in the European theater (as in "European theater of war").

Leonid Brezhnev, the Soviet leader, rejected President Reagan's proposal. Mr. Brezhnev said that the Soviet Union was prepared to reduce drastically—but not eliminate—its intermediate-range missiles if NATO would forego plans for its new systems. Mr. Brezhnev also rejected President Reagan's assessment of the balance. By Moscow's count, there is an approximate balance of the weapons in question.

Of course, both sides have been careful to tailor their descriptions of the balance to fit their negotiating positions. For example, the Soviet Union has counted French and British nuclear systems in the balance, while the United States has not. And Moscow's balance includes America's Pershing I missiles in Europe—which lack the range to strike Soviet territory—but excludes Soviet aircraft and some missiles which can strike many West European targets. The Soviet union also includes U.S. carrier-based aircraft in its calculations while the United States does not.

From these divergent concepts of the balance, both sides claim to seek eventual parity in intermediate-range nuclear weapons systems. If they persist in this objective without changing the way they calculate the balance, generations of negotiators could travel to Geneva without ever reaching agreement.

Attempting to define a theater nuclear balance for Eurpoe is, after all, somewhat of an artificial exercise. The United States can, and in fact intends to, use a portion of its stragetic forces for "European" missions if war should come. The Soviet Union can target part of its strategic forces on European targets. The United States already has announced that it intends to deploy hundreds of sea-launched nuclear cruise missiles on ships and submarines. One presumes that the Soviet Union eventually will follow suit. In such a case, the deployment patterns of these ships could tip the balance in different directions on any given day.

Are the negotiations therefore destined to fail? Not necessarily. Agreement could be reached if the two sides would seek accord based on realistic definitions of their security requirements, rather than on the basis of their initial concepts of the elusive theater balance.

Richard Perle, assistant secretary of Defense for policy, recently told a congressional committee that the United States has carried no "fallback" position into the negotiations. This is not an unreasonable early posture for an official responsible for obtaining the best possible agreement for the United States. But given the vital national interests that could be served by successful negotiations, both Soviet and American policymakers might well benefit from unofficial consideration of alternatives ot the "balance of forces" negotiating approach.

One alternative would be to start from certain postulated security interests of the two sides, and then to derive possible negotiating outcomes from those postulates.

U.S. security interests might, for example, be defined as requiring the following basic objectives:

1. Arms control objectives

To reduce Soviet capabilities sufficiently to deny the Soviet Union confidence in its ability to launch a nuclear attack on the West or to launch a conventional attack under the cover of theater nuclear supremacy.

2. Armament objective

To strengthen linkage between Western Europe and the U.S. strategic guarantee, in effect warning the Soviet Union that no limited victories could be obtained in Europe without risking nuclear disaster.

Soviet interests, on the other hand, might be defined as including the following objectives:

1. Arms control objectives

To prevent the West from deploying systems which could, with little warning, destroy the Kremlin and other Soviet decision-making centers—a capability which the Soviet Union apparently fears the West would obtain by locating Pershing II missiles in West Germany.

2. Armament objective

To maintain sufficient intermediate range theater forces to deny the West the ability to control the "ladder of escalation" in any conflict and to balance a nuclear threat from China.

If the two sides were to accept such a definition of their negotiating objectives, then it might be possible to conceive of a negotiating outcome which satisfied the goals of both sides.

The elements of such an outcome would necessarily include large reductions of Soviet intermediate missiles. (For example, elimination of all obsolescent SS-4 and SS-5 missiles; reduction of SS-20 missiles to about 100, with only a portion of those permitted to be deployed West of the Urals. By Western count, the Soviets now have deployed more than 250 SS-20 missiles, 175 of them against NATO.) In return, the United States would cancel deployment of the (108) Pershing II missiles while reducing the planned deployment of cruise missiles (to about 200, for example, instead of the 464 now planned).

Such an initial agreement would appear consistent with both U.S. and Soviet security interests while at the same time constituting the first step in a progressive series of reductions of nuclear weapons in Europe.

Of course, steps would have to be taken to prevent circumvention of the agreement. If American intelligence officials judge that they cannot verify compliance of such an accord with "national techncial means"—which usually means satellites in orbit—then more intrusive forms of inspection will be required. The Soviet Union may have to discard some traditional phobias as the ultimate proof of its interest in nuclear arms control.

Furthermore, other systems cannot be allowed to fill the gap created by the initial limitations. The agreement would have to freeze levels of all other U.S. and Soviet land-based nuclear-capable aircraft and shorter-range missiles.

And, it remains all too clear that no agreement on theater systems will be viable unless it is accompanied by progress toward limitations on strategic nuclear arms. In particular, limitations on land-based missiles would be of very little benefit to anyone if they are accompanied by a new U.S.-Soviet race to deploy more nuclear weapons at sea.●

THE RIGHT TO VOTE TO BE DEBATED AGAIN

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, January 27, 1982, the Senate Subcommittee on Constitution will hold hearings on the extension of the Voting Rights Act. Toward the end of the 96th Congress, this House voted against numerous crippling amendments to the extension of the Voting Rights Act. In addition, this House, by a surprising, but welcome vote of 389 yeas and 24 nays, accepted the House Judiciary's version on one of the most important pieces of civil rights legislation ever passed in our country. By this overwhelming vote, we sent a signal to the Nation and the administration that the present law governing voting rights must be extended and it must be extended effectively, efficiently, and equally. The administration, in its insensitive and confusing manner, has requested a delay in the hearings on the House version of the Voting Rights Act. With this action the administration has played a shell game with the civil rights of Americans.

The bill that this House overwhelmingly passed has been introduced in the Senate with 61 cosponsors. This is a clear indication that the House bill will pass the Senate if given a chance to do so. However, we have an administration that sends out confusing and inconsistent statements: I offer the issue of tax-exempt status for private schools as a clear example. To further cloud and befuddle the public, the administration has stated that it will offer its own version of the Voting Rights Act, ignoring the complete support H.R. 3112 has received from an overwhelming segment of our society and the clear bipartisan support our bill has in both Houses of Congress. I call upon the President to be more forthright and sincere with the public. Furthermore, I urge the public and my fellow colleagues to express their concern to the President and to exhort him to support H.R. 3112, Senate version S. 1992, as clearly accepted by the representatives of the people.●

THE VOTING RIGHTS ACT EXTENSION

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, Prof. Howard Ball, head of the political science department at Mississippi State University makes a convincing case for Senate approval of the Voting Rights Act Extension in the following article from the January 26 edition of the Washington Post.

I commend its perusal to my colleagues.

The article follows:

MISSISSIPPI'S VOTING WRONGS

(By Howard Ball)

STARKVILLE, Miss.—Friends of mine in Mississippi argue that the 1965 Voting Rights Act is no longer needed here. "Look how many blacks are voting," they say to me, pointing to an increase from 30,000 to 300,000 in the number of blacks registered to vote in Mississippi since 1965. But I know, and so do they, that the important question is not numbers but the consequences of this quantitative change.

For a black living in Tunica County, Miss., what good does it do to vote? The 1980 census showed a 73 percent black majority in that county, yet all five county supervisors—the chief policy-making agents—were white. And Tunica County is not an isolated situation; of the 22 majority black counties in Mississippi, eight have no black representation on the boards of supervisors and only two have black majorities on the boards: Clairbone County (75 percent black) and Jefferson County (82 percent black).

There are a number of "voting wrongs" still used by the white power structure in Mississippi that account for this situation:

At-large elections. Multi-member legislative districts with at-large elections are created in areas of black population concentrations. Given the fact that there are twice as many whites registered as blacks (690,272 to 304,146), the at-large election almost always leads to white candidates' winning the election.

At the county level, 35 of the 82 counties in Mississippi have made efforts to switch to at-large elections for county boards of commissioners or county school boards because of the increase in black voter registration.

Forty-six towns have attempted to go to at-large municipal elections to prevent the election of a black city council member.

Gerrymandering. Fourteen counties have attempted to gerrymander county supervisors' districts in order to dilute black voting strength. As a consequence, in a state with about 35 percent black population, there are 27 black county supervisors (7 percent) out of a total of 410.

Blocking black independent candidates from running in statewide elections. There have been a number of attempts to achieve this end including an open primary bill that has been introduced in the Mississippi legislature in 1966, 1970, 1976, 1979.

Making elective offices appointive ones when blacks start to win them.

Annexing white subdivisions to municipalities in order to dilute the black vote, e.g., the city of Jackson's annexations in 1960 (90 percent white), 1971 (85 percent white), and 1976 (74 percent white).

Switching polling places literally the night before an election. This is the voting reality in Mississippi.

Pointing to the numerical increase in black voting, therefore, while overlooking these strategies (and others, including economic coercion in rural delta communities where the white cotton manager is still the boss) for diluting the black vote, does not capture the state of voting affairs in Mississippi.

Sixteen years after the passage of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, efforts continue to discriminate against blacks and other minorities. Were it not for the presence of the Voting Rights Act, many of the strategies described above would have a devastating impact on black voting in Mississippi.

In particular, were it not for Section 5, the "preclearance" section of the Voting Rights Act, there would have been a total destruction of the black voter's impact on elections in Mississippi. Section 5 was placed into the act to prevent communities from changing voting procedures in such a way that there would be a dilution of the black vote.

The purpose and effect of every voting change proposed by any community in Mississippi must be examined by the Department of Justice in Washington. If the reviewer (and there are only about 20 persons handling the thousands of preclearances received by the department annually) determines that the proposed voting change would have the purpose or effect of diluting the votes of blacks or other minorities, then the department will object to that change. (There have been 77 such Mississippi election laws objected to by the Justice Department—40, more than half the total, since 1975! I point this fact out to my friends in Mississippi who claim that things have gotten better in recent years.)

Many of the voting wrongs described above have been objected to by the Justice Department. In some instances, the local power-holders accepted the judgment and did not implement the change; in other instances, local municipalities simply ignored the objection and annexed, redistricted or changed to at-large elections. This has led to litigation in federal court, where the Justice Department, as plaintiff, must bring suit to enjoin the community from implementing an electoral change already objected to by the department!

The Voting Rights Act has been somewhat successful in enabling blacks to register and vote, but it has not yet convinced many people that the right to vote is a constitutional right and not a matter of white privilege. Until there is an acceptance on the part of white folk in Mississippi that we all have the constitutional right to vote, the Voting Rights Act is desperately needed, especially the preclearance provision of the act.●

HOW THE DEMOCRATS CAN GET BACK INTO THE GAME

HON. PETER A. PEYSER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, January 24 the New York Daily News printed an Op/Ed piece I authored. I would like to share the full text of this article with my colleagues, and ask that it be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

[From the New York Daily News, Jan. 24, 1982]

HOW THE DEMOCRATS CAN GET BACK INTO THE GAME

(By Representative PETER PEYSER)

Democrats in the Congress have just finished a year of being on the defense. In football terms, we have been pushed all over the field and have been sacked every time we've had the ball.

But if the Jets and the Giants can make the kind of comeback they have, certainly we can do the same in the year ahead.

Let's take a look at what is going to happen in 1982 on the domestic scene as a result of what the Reagan Administration has done in 1981. These are the unhappy facts: there will be a cutback in benefits for our senior citizens, not only in medical programs such as medicare, but in operation of senior centers and nutrition programs; there will be a dramatic cutback on aid to the handicapped; there will be an increase in the flow of drugs into the country due to cuts in the budgets of the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Coast Guard; for those attending college there will be less available for grants, and for many middle and lower income students no eligibility for student loans; there will be reductions and increased restrictions on legal services for the poor.

In addition, federally supported housing starts will be sharply reduced, adding to the problems in the construction industry. Cities and states such as New York will have to get by with less operating monies for mass transit. There will be an increase in illegal aliens due to cuts in funds for the agency charged with halting illegal entries. Government aided research into new energy forms to end our continued dependence on Arab oil will all but cease. Our national parks and offshore areas will be threatened by development under the policies of Interior Secretary Watt. The arts and humanities will suffer under the cuts made under the unrealistic notion that private industry can take up the slack. And local taxes will rise due to the cutback of federal funds and services to local governments.

On top of all this, even Administration economists concede that unemployment will continue to rise, along with the deficit which will now exceed $100 billion in 1982—the largest in our nation's history.

These then are the highlights of what's in store for 1982. I believe the Democratic party has the opportunity to regain the offensive. We can do so if we:

1. Demand that the new tax advantages given the major oil producers in the President's tax bill be rescinded. By this action we can increase revenues by ten to twenty billion dollars.

2. Defer part of the 1983 and 1984 tax cuts until such time as the deficit gets more under control. The truth is that the campaign promises which resulted in these tax cuts are having a devastating effect on the economy.

3. Review the booming defense budget with an eye to cutting billions of acknowledged waste before we put billions more into questionable weapons systems.

4. Acknowledge the needs of the growing number of unemployed and not pretend that somehow they and their families will get along. This may mean new jobs programs—profiting from mistakes that have been made in the past.

5. Rectify the harm and unnecessary hardship that we have placed on our senior citizens by offering reasonable solutions to their problems, including adequate medical care for the elderly poor.

6. Reinstitute a meaningful program that will double present housing starts. Our country has always moved ahead when housing construction has been strong.

7. Revive the idea that mass transit is essential if we are going to overcome the energy and environmental problems in our metropolitan areas.

8. Continue to strive to develop alternate sources of energy so that we can reduce our dependence on foreign sources of energy.

9. Recognize the fact that our future lies with our youth and to deny them educational opportunity is to deny ourselves the future we all hope for. In exchange, we must demand performance on their part and on the part of our colleges and universities.

10. As a party and as Members of Congress must be willing to resist the demands of special interest groups who would have us sacrifice the rights of the people.

With this program we can move our country forward and put our party back into the game. We can and should take these actions knowing that the majority of Americans want to be honest, fair, and above all, caring for the good of our country and her people.●

NEW CONGRESSIONAL PAY PERKS SHOULD BE REVERSED

HON. MARGE ROUKEMA

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced two measures—H.R. 5329 and House Resolution 319—which would rescind recent changes in the law concerning tax deductions for Members of Congress and the rules on outside earnings limitations, respectively. Many Members, I am certain, share my sense of indignation at the tactics used to enact changes last December, without the conscious knowledge of most Members of Congress.

Last October, in a parliamentary maneuver designed to avoid a recorded vote, the House agreed to remove the $3,000 limit on tax deductions for living expenses while they are in Washington. This put the Congress under the same restrictions as other taxpayers, instead of limiting them to an artificially devised maximum of $3,000. But, in December, the Congress was presented with what amounts to a standard deduction for business expenses each day the Congress is in session. This is a distinction that we do not permit for other citizens and it could add up to substantial tax benefits for Members without requiring any substantiation of legitimate expenses.

The questionable nature of this benefit was illustrated in the manner in which it was adopted. A rider was added to the Black Lung Benefits Relief Act of 1981 by the other body at the very last minute. It was never printed for the House, and most Members only learned of the rider long after the vote was finished. Clearly, this is not a respectable way to legislate.

In another parliamentary maneuver, by a unanimous consent request before a nearly empty Chamber, the House raised the limit on outside earnings from 15 percent of annual salary to 30 percent. This occurred despite the fact that the House rejected the same proposal in a recorded vote last October. There are, in my opinion, real ethical problems in doing so. Congress has shown itself to be disingenuous on this issue. If we feel we need a pay raise, we should have a public, recorded vote on the issue. Instead, this action permits a Member's salary to be supplemented by honoraria, by more than $18,000 in income from outside sources—a substantial increase. This amounts to a significant subsidy by special interests to congressional salaries. In my opinion, both actions were wrong in principle and improperly enacted.

My proposed legislation would rollback the outside earnings limitation from 30 to 15 percent—the level at which it has existed for 2 years. The second measure would eliminate the $75 per day automatic, unsubstantiated deduction for Members of Congress and put them on equal footing—and under the same rules—as other taxpayers. If we have legitimate deductions, we can take them, but we should have to itemize them just like everyone else. My bill would not restore the $3,000 expenses limitation which now appears to be inordinately low.

Let me add one other important point. Regardless of anyone's position on the merits of this issue—the pros and cons of limitation on congressional salaries, outside earnings, and living expense deductions—we cannot condone the methods by which these changes were adopted. The issue should be considered fully by the Ways and Means and Rules Committees and debated publicly by the House. If any proposed changes come before us, they absolutely deserve a recorded vote. Members of Congress should not rely upon unanimous consent decrees or voice votes to obscure their true positions on this issue.

I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this effort to rescind these changes. If we are to make changes in the future, let us do it in an open manner, and not further undermine the credibility of the institution.●

EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Supreme Court stayed U.S. District Judge Marion Callister's ruling that Congress did not have the authority to extend the deadline for ratifying the equal rights amendment.

It is a great victory. As the following Denver Post editorial mentions, the Callister decision imposed a legal cloud over the ERA. The Supreme Court's actions yesterday lifted that cloud from the ERA and dropped it on Judge Callister.

I am confident that as the ERA proceeds through its proper forum, the State legislatures, American women will find that the Denver Post's words ring true—the ERA isn't dead:

[From the Denver Post, Jan. 8, 1982]

ERA ISN'T DEAD

When U.S. District Judge Marion Callister ruled recently that Congress exceeded its authority in extending the deadline for ratifying the Equal Rights Amendment, it appeared the death knell for ERA had been sounded.

Phyllis Schlafly, who has led the drive to defeat the amendment, all but danced in the street, and the media began reporting its death.

Both actions were premature.

The National Organization for Women and other ERA backers have appealed Callister's decision to the U.S. Supreme Court. Pending court action, states have until June 30 to ratify ERA.

Thirty-five states, including Colorado, have ratified the amendment; three more are needed before it can become part of the Constitution. ERA proponents are focusing their efforts in Oklahoma, Florida, Illinois, Missouri, North Carolina and Virginia.

However, ERA backers don't have a fair shot at persuading legislatures to approve the amendment when the question of congressional authority to extend the deadline hangs in the balance. To remove the legal cloud Callister's decision has imposed, the Supreme Court should agree to NOW's request for a speedy ruling.

In the meantime, ERA supporters should continue to push for ratification in states they have targeted.

Leadership in the Oklahoma Legislature supports the amendment. An aggressive campaign for passage is being waged by Oklahoma Homemakers for ERA, and NOW expects a vote soon. An early vote also is expected by the Florida Legislature.

In Illinois, a special election for lieutenant governor is turning into a referendum on ERA. The outcome could turn the tide in the Illinois Legislature, which has been opposed to ERA.

None of these will be easy battles. But unless the Supreme Court decides otherwise, ERA supporters have nearly six months to push their campaign to success. They shouldn't give up now.●

CLAUDE PEPPER A RALLYING POINT FOR OLDER AMERICANS

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, our colleague, CLAUDE PEPPER, continues to bring honor on the Congress by his extraordinary efforts on behalf of older people. Most recently, when partisan maneuvering threatened the integrity of the White House Conference on the Aging, CLAUDE PEPPER demonstrated again why he is the single most important member of the Federal Government to the older people of our country.

As this article, by Wendell Coltin, the very distinguished expert on elderly affairs of the Boston Herald American documents, CLAUDE PEPPER intervened in the White Office Conference in a manner typical of him. With a display of courage, with his masterful knowledge of the facts as they affect elderly people, and with his extraordinary sense of how best to affect public policy in a responsible manner, CLAUDE PEPPER prevented the White House Conference from becoming a disaster for those concerned with protecting the economic and social well being of older citizens.

I am delighted that Wendell Coltin took the trouble to recognize the important role which Congressman PEPPER played in this matter and I think that this ought to be shared with the membership so that people will understand how essential it is that the work of our colleague, Mr. PEPPER, does in his capacity as the Chair of the Select Committee on Aging, be supported:

[From the Boston Herald American, Dec. 13, 1981]

A DASH OF PEPPER HELPS ELDERLY

(By Wendell Coltin)

By their deeds, you shall know them.

Gutsy 81-year-old Rep. Claude Pepper didn't have to go before the White House Conference on Aging to tell delegates he was their friend; they already knew that he is, indeed, their foremost champion on the Washington scene.

The admiration for the longtime congressman from Florida, who heads the House Select Committee on Aging, was reflected by the applause greeting his every appearance.

"Pepper really saved the day," Frank J. Manning, president of the Massachusetts Ass'n of Older Americans, remarked upon his return. He referred to Pepper "making it possible" to get positive resolutions on Social Security, by going to a meeting of the Committee on Economic Well-Being and "turning around a decision of that committee, through negotiation."

Manning said, "There was no question in my mind the administration wanted to control strategic committees."

The Wall Street Journal reported the dissatisfaction of hundreds of delegates with the conference was evident when they jammed a corridor outside a conference room to support an attempt by Pepper, an honorary co-chairman to address the committee. Their presence, it was pointed out, reflected feelings of many persons that conference leaders had controlled the membership and direction of several committees, including the one on Social Security, to prevent strong criticism of Reagan administration policies.

After the more than 2,200 delegates had returned to their homes throughout the country, I talked with a friend long connected with a national organization for older persons. He told me, "It was one of Pepper's shining hours politically. He was the man of the hour without demonstrating. Without him, it would have ended in chaos.

"After all the charges of rigging by the administration the older people came out looking pretty good," he added. "Even if it was stacked, the administration did a bad job of stacking. A lot of the recommendations were diametrically opposed to the administration's position. They botched it."

Pepper's committee conducted hearings on the controversial survey and Human Services Secretary Richard S. Schweiker testified.

Tomorrow, when the MAOA holds its 13th annual meeting in the Dorothy Quincy Suite of the old John Hancock Building, the WHCOA will be discussed. There also will be panels on Social Security and home care.

Sens. Edward M. Kennedy and Paul Tsongas and Fourth District Rep. Barney Frank, a member of the House Committee on Aging, will address the meeting.

From a Haverhill AARP chapter member: Wasn't there a law passed a few years ago that gave a Social Security benefit to all persons 65 and over who didn't work under Social Security?

You are thinking of the Special Age 72 Benefit enacted in October 1966. It was paid to person who were not getting a SS benefit, or any other governmental benefit or pension, or had not worked under SS long enough for regular benefits to be paid. It is still being received by more than 110,000 persons who are 86 and over, but for several years no additions have been made to the Special Age 72 Benefit rolls.

Note: Originally, it was a $35 per month benefit for an individual; $52.50 for an eligible couple. It has risen over the years to $117 for an individual, $175.50 for an eligible couple.●

WHITTIER POLICE CHIEF JIM BALE: A MAN OF MANY ACCOMPLISHMENTS

HON. WAYNE GRISHAM

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. GRISHAM. Mr. Speaker, Thursday, January 21, I had the distinct honor of participating in a testimonial dinner for one of California's finest citizens, Whittier Police Chief James F. Bale. I have had the privilege of maintaining a friendship with Police Chief Bale and would like to make my colleagues aware of his many contributions to the Whittier area.

Chief Bale began his law enforcement career in 1950 as a police officer in Pontiac, Mich. In 1960 he assumed the position of chief of police in Sheridan, Wyo., a post he held until 1963. He then was named the chief of police of Sierra Madre, and since 1967 has distinguished himself as chief of police of the fine city of Whittier, Calif.

Chief Bale's professional accomplishments are numerous. He has distinguished himself by providing professional expertise as a member of the Los Angeles Regional Criminal Justice Planning Board, member of the Police Advisory Board of Rio Hondo College, membership of the Advisory Board of the Police Science program at Pasadena City College, and is the author of several publications and technical writings.

Jim Bale's contributions extend beyond those of the normal working day. He has been active in civic organizations such as the International Association of Chiefs of Police, the California Police Chiefs' Association, the Whittier Lions Club, the board of directors of Whittier Salvation Army, the board of directors of the Boys and Girls Club of Whittier, and is currently serving a term as chairman of the Advisory Board of the Salvation Army.

In a society where law and order is so important, the city of Whittier is lucky to have a person with the qualities of Jim Bale. Chief Bale is never too busy to undertake any project that will make Whittier a better place in which to live. I am proud to join in this tribute to my good friend and congratulate him on this fine honor. No person is more deserving. Police Chief Jim Bale has made Whittier, Calif., a model city.●

PRIVATE AGENCY IN SCOTTSDALE DONATES FOOD TO POLISH PEOPLE

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, since the President wisely cut off American aid to the Soviet-controlled Government of Poland, there have been many private, nonpolitical organizations throughout our country which have greatly eased the repression and suffering of the Polish people as a result of martial law the past several weeks.

One international relief agency based in Scottsdale, Ariz., Food for the Hungry, has officially donated 1,426,607 pounds of food and other needed goods to the people of Poland. The agency estimated the total value of the donation is $857,644. The group distributes the goods through the United Evangelical Churches in Poland, an interchurch group of 152 local congregations comprising 5 major church movements.

The crisis in Poland, spearheaded by the realization in Moscow that the freedom-starved people of Poland are opposed to the totalitarian doctrines espoused by Communist regimes, will always be critical as long as Soviet soldiers and a puppet leadership continue to abate all Polish liberties. But in the meantime, I applaud the efforts of groups, like Food for the Hungry, which work with other private organizations and churches in Poland to feed the hungers of a proud citizenry that sees little hope for the future as long as Soviet control exists.●

BILL "TIGER" REESE—SAN PEDRO'S CITIZEN OF THE YEAR

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, on January 28, 1982, Los Angeles Harbor area residents will gather at the Princess Louise Restaurant to honor and recognize Bill "Tiger" Reese as Citizen of the Year for the community of San Pedro.

Tiger Reese needs little introduction to any area resident who has ever had even the most passing interest in following sporting events in and around San Pedro. I say this because Tiger has donated literally thousands of hours of his own time to the often thankless job of announcing area sporting events. In fact, through his unselfish and tireless efforts, Tiger has come to be known around town as the voice of San Pedro sports.

One of 10 brothers and sisters, Tiger attended Point Fermin Elementary School and Dana Junior High School before graduating from San Pedro High School in 1935. As many of us can too well remember, 1935 saw us in the midst of a worldwide depression, and because of this economic crisis many able high school graduates were not afforded the opportunity to further their education in a college classroom—Tiger Reese was part of this group.

Upon his high school graduation Tiger joined the Civilian Conservation Corps, and he altruistically sent $25 of his monthly $30 pay check back to his family. Tiger returned to San Pedro shortly thereafter and upon his arrival began working on the docks. However, this often grueling work was abruptly interrupted in 1941 with the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor. The following year, Tiger entered the Army and served in North Africa and Italy.

Upon his discharge from the service, Tiger again returned to San Pedro and commenced working for the Los Angeles Department of Water and Power as a meter reader and field service dispatcher. This work enabled Tiger to become even better acquainted with San Pedro's residents, and also gave him time to attend many sporting events in the harbor area.

In 1946, Tiger first donated his services as a sports announcer when, midway through the season, he began to announce San Pedro Athletic Club football games at Daniels Field. During this postwar era, the San Pedro Athletic Club was one of this country's most feared and respected semipro teams. The following year Tiger began calling games for the San Pedro High School. I might add that this association with his alma mater is as strong today as it was in 1947. The year 1949 witnessed the beginning of Los Angeles Harbor College's football program and, yes, Tiger began announcing Seahawk home games. Subsequently, Tiger announced games for the Mary Star of the Sea High School and, as if this was not enough, he made the time to call municipal fast pitch softball games 6 nights a week; San Pedro Boys Club football games; and the club's Biddy basketball State tournament games.

Mr. Speaker, the night of January 28 will most definitely be a memorable occasion as Tiger Reese's many friends gather to pay tribute to him for all he has done for the men, women, and children of San Pedro. It is a fitting occasion to a man who has contributed so much of his time and talents for the benefit of others.

My wife, Lee, joins me in offering our own words of congratulation to Tiger. We send our best wishes for future success and happiness to him and his wife Mary, their two children, Laura Donna and Martha, and their many grandchildren.●

INCREASING NUMBER OF AMERICANS SUFFER FROM HUNGER AND MALNUTRITION

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, a distressing result of the current economic picture and the Reagan administration's budget cutting is the increasing number of Americans who are suffering from hunger and malnutrition. The haunting memory of depression soup lines had instigated an intense and increasingly successful Federal war on malnutrition; however, the Reagan administration has begun a cruel retreat from progressive efforts to eliminate hunger in this country. The following editorial from the January 8, 1982, edition of the New York Times describes the administration's attack on even the most cost effective of food programs, and the sad numbers of ashamed, unemployed persons who are forced to ask for a food handout:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 8, 1982]

MOUTHS TO FEED

PREGNANT WOMEN, CHILDREN

The United States, like all the world, has its portion of crime, poverty and unemployment. But until recently one could boast that no American need ever fear hunger. A dozen years of intense Federal effort have eliminated most of the gross malnutrition in this country.

One of those efforts, begun in 1967, is a program that provides baby formula and diet supplements for poor pregnant and nursing women, infants and children under 5 and thus called WIC. The recipients' food packages are, in a sense, prescriptions, as vital a medical aid to pregnant women and little children as immunization.

The WIC program is known to lower the mortality rate due to low birth weight; one major study found that for every $1 spent, $3 was saved in Medicaid expenses for hospitalization. (Just one day in a neo-natal unit can cost $550.) And that $3 does not include the saving in lifetime costs of social services or welfare benefits for a child born handicapped because its mother was ill-nourished.

At the moment, however, the program is faced with two big problems. One is old—it has been able to reach only 2.2 million of the 8.3 million people who are eligible and in need. The other is new—Administration officials say that President Reagan will propose reducing the program's budget from $940 million to $630 million in the coming year.

That such a curtailment is cruel may not cut much ice with those who think poor women shouldn't be having all those children anyway. But they may understand that it is shortsighted: money spent now—$423 per recipient per year—saves a lot of money later. Surely so efficient and practical a program should appeal to Mr. Reagan's head, even if it does not touch his heart.

AND ABLE-BODIED WORKERS

"They eat very quickly, and then they quickly disappear." That's how Brother Steve Gliko, a Milwaukee priest, describes the growing number of jobless young people who slink away, ashamed, after patronizing his church's free meals program.

Sadly, business is booming as idle workers feel the draft of a frigid economy. The deepening recession has devastated the automotive and housing industries and dampened sales in other sectors. Government jobs have been reduced at every level. CETA public jobs have been eliminated. And the Depression memory of soup kitchens shames Washington and the nation.

Yet the Reagan Administration has curtailed many programs that soften the impact of unemployment. At its urging, Congress has tightened eligibility for welfare and food stamps and curbed extended unemployment compensation. Governors and mayors, scrambling to compensate for other cuts, often cannot assume added public assistance burdens. Nor have church-sponsored emergency meals programs escaped reductions in Federal aid. And the Administration isn't through.

Nevertheless, the needy are flocking to free-meal centers. The Salvation Army reports that demand is up 10 to 30 percent nationwide; in one Ohio region the number of takers for free Thanksgiving and Christmas dinners doubled over last year. And the clientele is changing. Five years ago, Brother Gliko says, almost all were drug addicts and alcoholics. Now most are jobless young people whose savings, and benefits, are exhausted.

Successive Administrations of both parties have taken it as a duty of government to see that people are fed. Not this one. It calls for private charity. But charity can no more fill the gap now than it could when President Hoover expressed confidence that "the hungry and unemployed will be cared for by our sense of voluntary organization and community service." Soup kitchens are a sad signal of retreat.●

REVISION TO OUR ESTATE TAX LAWS

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill which would alleviate an inequity in our Tax Code as it relates to the valuation of property for estate tax purposes.

Section 2032a of the Internal Revenue Code allows qualified real property used in a farm or other closely held businesses to be included in a decedent's gross estate at a value less than its fair market value. If the act's requirements are satisfied, the executor may elect to value such property on the basis of the property's actual use rather than on the traditional basis of highest or best use. Prior to the enactment of the Economic Recovery Tax Act, this provision could only be elected on a timely filed return.

With the passage of the President's bipartisan tax proposal, however, a new section 421(j)(3) amended the code to allow the special use valuation provisions of section 2032a to be elected on a late-filed return, provided the return is the first filed by the estate. The legislative history of this amendment clearly indicates it was motivated by the belief that it is inequitable to deprive qualified heirs of the benefits of special use valuation solely because the decedent's estate tax return was filed after the date on which it was due. In fact, the Treasury Department agrees that section 2032a was not designed to be a late filing penalty.

Mr. Speaker, although several of the Economic Recovery Tax Act amendments to section 2032a apply retroactively to the estates of decedents dying after December 31, 1976, section 421(j)(3) does not. Section 421(j)(3) currently applies only to the estates of decedents dying after December 31, 1981.

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment, it seems unfair and inequitable that these individuals, whose inability to file a timely return inspired the amendment in the first place are now unable to benefit from it.

With this in mind, I am today offering this technical amendment to the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981 and am very hopeful that the House Ways and Means Committee will in its wisdom include this equity provision within its upcoming technical corrections bill.

Finally, let me say to my colleagues that if section 421(j)(3) were given retroactive treatment, the revenue loss and administrative burden to the Treasury Department would be absolutely insignificant for the impact of this amendment is limited to situations where the executor made an election on the estate's first return, but the election was not honored because the return was filed late.

Most importantly, however, the taxpayers assisted by such an amendment are the very persons that section 421(j)(3) was designed to aid, namely, farmers whose executors, attorneys, and legal representatives were not able to timely file an estate tax return due to the complexity of the Estate Tax Code.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the adoption of this much needed legislation.●

ICA'S EXCHANGE PROGRAMS

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I received the following correspondence from Mr. Ros Kelly, an Australian Member of Parliament, concerning the exchange programs of the International Communications Agency. Mr. Kelly personally participated in one of these programs, and found that the experience gave him a better understanding and appreciation of our country. I believe Mr. Kelly's views support what some of us have been saying for some time, namely, that an effective foreign policy requires not only the traditional elements of diplomacy and military policy, but strong interpersonal programs that further understanding between influential leaders in both the government and business sectors. Mr. Kelly's letter follows:

PARLIAMENT OF AUSTRALIA,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Canberra, A.C.T., December 15, 1981.

Hon. WILLIAM S. BROOMFIELD,
House Committee on Foreign Affairs,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BROOMFIELD: I am writing as a concerned friend to you and several of your Congressional colleagues about an American Government program from which I have just returned. It was a most rewarding experience; yet I now hear that the program is in jeopardy of budgetary extinction.

This past October and November I spent four weeks travelling about the United States as a member of a group tour sponsored and organized by the United States International Communication Agency. There were 12 of us from 12 countries around the world.

From my point of view—and, if I may say so, from yours as well—the visit was a complete success. I compared notes with all the right Americans, and benefited from observations that I am already putting into practice in my legislative and political work here. I learned about countries I would probably never have a chance to visit, and told others about my own homeland.

But the deepest impression I carried back is of the friendliness of the American people, and the similarities between us.

The days I spent as a guest in people's homes, sharing their meals and daily lives, talking about their hopes and problems, taught me more about America than I could ever learn from the press or television. It has provided me with warm memories and a much clearer understanding than I could ever have achieved without being a participant in the program.

Now, I discover the program may be terminated, or at least severely reduced because of lack of resources.

I can obviously only speak from my own experience, but that impels me to urge you in the strongest terms to increase, rather than diminish, the funds available to the United States International Communication Agency for carrying on programs that contribute to international understanding, so that more of us can learn for ourselves what you are all about, and so that we all have a chance to keep the door open after we return home.

Sincerely,

ROS KELLY,
Member for Canberra.●

VOTING RIGHTS: BE STRONG

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, the following Washington Post editorial of January 26, 1982, wisely suggests that President Reagan should listen to his friends on Capitol Hill and support the voting rights extension as passed by the House by a massive vote of 380 to 24.

VOTING RIGHTS: BE STRONG

Later today the president will be making final revisions of his State of the Union message. Among other subjects, he is expected to announce the administration's position on extension of the Voting Rights Act. The attorney general's scheduled appearance before the Senate Judiciary Committee was postponed last week because that position had not yet been firmly established. Until the policy is set in type there is still time to urge the president to support the House-passed version of this bill.

The House bill reaffirms the nation's commitment to protect the most important right guaranteed by the Constitution to all our citizens—the right to vote. When minorities are denied full participation in the electoral process, representative government is flawed. The Voting Rights Act, passed originally in 1965, has been enormously successful. Voter registration of minorities in the covered states has gone from 29 percent to over 50 percent in the last 17 years. The number of black elected officials in these same states has increased from 158 to 1,813 in the last 12 years. But as Professor Howard Ball's article on the opposite page demonstrates, efforts are still being made to subvert the law and dilute the voting power of minorities. The Voting Rights Act is the most powerful weapon available to defeat these efforts.

Controversy has centered around Section 2 of the bill, as passed by the House. This provision would allow courts to consider a number of factors, including discriminatory effects of a law, in deciding whether that law denies or abridges the right to vote. Opponents of the measure say this would require courts to strike down any voting system that didn't result in proportional representation. Not true. It would simply reinstate the standard used by the courts before the Supreme Court decision in Mobile v. Bolden, a 1980 case requiring proof that the drafters of the law in question intended to discriminate—a standard that is virtually impossible to meet since the legislators in question have all been dead for years.

In earlier cases the Supreme Court had considered the totality of circumstances—including election results, responsiveness of elected officials to the needs of minorities, nominating procedures and history of discrimination—to determine whether the challenged system really shut out racial minorities. In a 1971 case, Whitecomb v. Chavis, the court upheld at-large elections in Indianapolis even though black voter strength was diluted, because there was not sufficient additional evidence of discrimination. Two years later, in White v. Regester, the court struck down a similar system in Texas because other evidence of discrimination was present. That is the standard to which the House-passed bill would return.

The president has received some very bad advice on civil rights matters from his associates in recent weeks. The same people who told him that it would be wise to restore tax-exempt status to segregated schools are urging him to oppose Section 2 as passed by the House. This bill was passed by a vote of 389 to 24. It has been cosponsored by 61 senators—enough even to stop a filibuster. The president should listen to his friends on the Hill and not just those in his own offices in deciding what message on civil rights he sends to the country tonight.●

NO HELP FOR JARUZELSKI

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, on January 1, 1982, in the Washington Post, my good friend, Mr. Jan Nowak, national director of the Polish American Congress, analyzed some of the events of the Polish crisis. His remarkable insight stems from a keen intelligence sharpened by more than 30 years as head of the Polish language section of Radio Free Europe.

Mr. Nowak makes some excellent points in his piece and certain valuable conclusions. They are worthy of the consideration of the Members.

NO HELP FOR JARUZELSKI

(By Jan Nowak)

As a Pole, it is infinitely painful for me to watch as the free nations of Western Europe and even some Americans display such apparent readiness to believe the Kremlin's carefully orchestrated version of recent events in Poland.

According to this version:

Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski's "last minute" decision to declare war against the Polish people was triggered by the excessive demands of Solidarity, which were threatening the country with chaos.

Reports from Poland of deaths, beatings of arrested Solidarity members and inhuman conditions in the prison camps are largely lies.

If the West does not support Jaruzelski's military regime, it could lead to a takeover by Poland's more ruthless hard-line Communists, or even Soviet invasion.

In contrast to the litany outlined above, there is now strong and growing evidence that the truth is this:

Meticulous preparations for the military crackdown on Solidarity and imposition of martial law throughout the country began nine months ago, soon after Jaruzelski's appointment as prime minister, which gave him total command of the civilian and military apparatus of the state.

Far from being a Polish patriot, Jaruzelski has a record of total loyalty to Moscow. In 1947 he was decorated and promoted for the thoroughness with which he liquidated the remains of Poland's non-communist partisans. After training at the Soviet Military Academy, he was appointed chief political commissar of the Polish army, a key position of trust in Moscow's eyes. His elevation to his present position of unprecedented power as head of the government, the Polish Communist party and the military would have been unthinkable without the Kremlin's full endorsement.

The reports of mistreatment of Solidarity leaders and other Poles arrested in Jaruzelski's crackdown have not been exaggerated.

We hear that Solidarity "went too far." Aside from the questionable taste of prosperous Western democracies accusing Polish workers of going too far in seeking the bare rudiments of democracy, the facts show that Solidarity remained remarkably restrained in the face of repeated acts of duplicity by the Communist leaders it was dealing with.

There is now considerable evidence that the food shortages and other economic setbacks, blamed by the government and media on the activities of Solidarity, were both encouraged and manipulated by the government itself. As Zdzislaw Rurarz, the former Polish ambassador to Japan, testified after defecting to this country, the government's strategy in the period before the crackdown was "the worse, the better".

When Japan offered rice, Rurarz had difficulty persuading the Warsaw government to accept it. West Germany had a similar experience when it offered powdered milk for infants. Butter shipped by the United States was at first "disqualified" by Polish customs on the grounds that the percentage of fat was insufficient for Polish regulations. As the lines for food grew longer, even the most available food supplies were held back—to reappear in relative abundance as soon as martial law was declared.

It can be argued that Poland's increasing problems developed because not Solidarity but the government itself chose to go on strike. By refusing to negotiate seriously, by raising difficulties over food shipments, by refusing to take the most obvious steps to improve food distribution and stem the deterioration in the economy, the Polish government deliberately abdicated its responsibilities and encouraged the malaise.

But Jaruzelski's victory is an uneasy one. He can force workers back to the factories, but he cannot force them to work more efficiently. He is finding, as the Nazi occupiers of Poland found during World War II, that Polish workers can be surprisingly stubborn.

The West can either continue to prop up Jaruzelski with aid, or it can help the Polish workers in their passive resistance by refusing to assist Jaruzelski and by bringing increasing economic pressure on his regime.

Since 1956 the Soviet Union has reluctantly tolerated Polish unorthodoxy out of fear of a major confrontation with the Polish people. This fear is now being tested. Should it prove to have been groundless, the Soviet Union may well decide to turn back the clock not just to 1980, but to the rigid suppression of the early 1950s. It would be encouraged to adopt far tougher measures with its other East European client states.

This would upset the present military balance in Europe and raise defense questions for the West far greater than anything yet discussed in connection with the Polish crisis.●

ST. PAUL HIGH SCHOOL WINS THE 1981 BIG FIVE CONFERENCE

HON. WAYNE GRISHAM

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. GRISHAM. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to bring to the attention of my colleagues the outstanding accomplishment of the St. Paul High School football team. St. Paul's, under the capable leadership of the principal, Rev. Aidan M. Carroll, and head football coach Marijon Ancich, won the 1981 CIF Big Five Conference football championship.

The St. Paul Swordsmen play their games at the Monsignor Cranham Memorial Stadium in Santa Fe Springs, Calif. Coach Ancich was assisted in his winning efforts by varsity associate coaches John Larson, Jim Walker, Bob Hill, Miguel Olmedo, Paul Lopez, and Mike Stith. The team physician is Dr. John J. Brennan and the trainer is Al Hanson.

For the interest of my colleagues I have listed below the members of St. Paul High School's championship football team:

Dan Pogue, Mike Jiminez, Alex Espinoza, Larry Guereque, Dave Ferneau, Mike Aguirre, Brian Bukosky, Steve Chavez, Rich Arguijo, Andy Henderson, Mario Melendrez, Mike Shepherd, and Tony Sarmiento.

Robert Garcia, John Donlevy, Xavier Espino, Larry Martinez, Paul Dispalatro, Lou Cabral, Seb Apodaca, Deron Ertle, Ted Lawrence, Manual Juarez, Leroy Orozco, Frank Quattrocchi, and Mark Mosqueda.

Tony Stagno, Jose Pina, Ruben Segura, Fred Salas, Ray Fontes, John Matuz, Paul Magana, Paul Martin, Steve Montez, John Gasparian, Tim Younger, Joe Ross, and Ron Gray.

Parris DeVine, Steve Martinson, Cliff Heidrich, Andy DeGrasse, Jeff Pogue, Mike Cruz, Alan Floyd, Casey Morales, Rich Canales, Bill Blackett, Jim Magdaleno, Norm Enfield, and Pat Haro.

Ed Espinoza, Sal Apodaca, Mario Irizarry, Nick Dispalatro, Hank Mondaca, Fred Huizar, Rich Alcantara, Mark Walker, Frank Morones, Robert Oviedo, Ed Primero, Matt Cole, and Jose Olmedo.

George Pla, Lance Wingert, John Covarrubias, Mark Espinosa, Mike Sandoval, Todd White, Andy Stankiewicz, Hector Palacios, Greg Macias, Philip Salvatori, Bob Willig, and Brian Clements.

St. Paul High School, which was founded in 1956, has an enrollment of 1,420 students who come from Catholic grade schools and local public junior high schools. It has an academic program that is oriented toward sound moral and religious training in Catholic principles and worship; a well-rounded liberal arts program of studies; a warm family environment for personality development and growth; and an active and social and athletic program.

Over the past 25 years, approximately 6,000 young men and women have graduated from St. Paul High School. They have assumed responsible positions of leadership and service within the church and civic community. They are found in fields of medicine, engineering, law, education, military service, professional sports, and the arts. Their achievements are a living testimony to the work of the dedicated, competent faculty and staff that have served St. Paul High School throughout the past 25 years.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, St. Paul High School, besides boasting an outstanding athletic program, also possesses a well-respected academic program of which the constituents of my 33d Congressional District, are most proud. This is a balance that is difficult to attain by a learning institution, and I am pleased to represent them in Congress.●

FORMER ILLINOIS CONGRESSMAN HAROLD VELDE'S VIEWS ON WHITE HOUSE AGING CONFERENCE

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, a most distinguished resident of Sun City, Ariz., former Illinois Congressman Harold H. Velde, represented the Fourth District of Arizona at the 1981 White House Conference on Aging here in Washington.

I hold deep respect for the views of Congressman Velde, with equal admiration for his many years of work in this body a few decades ago. For the attention of my colleagues, I am attaching the personal statement of Harold H. Velde on the White House Conference on Aging. I urge all Members of Congress to pay particular notice to the recommendations he offers to provide financial stability to the endangered social security retirement system.

PERSONAL STATEMENT ON WHITE HOUSE CONFERENCE ON AGING BY HAROLD H. VELDE

While the White House Conference on Aging was marked by confusion and duplication of Agendas by the 14 Committees, as well as duplication and redundancy in its Recommendations, one thing is certain—the Conference presented the present Administration and the U.S. Congress every conceivable problem and ailment known to affect the elderly.

Unfortunately a great majority of the Resolutions advocated the expenditure of new and additional Federal funds to solve the problems of the elderly and Social Security Retirees but mostly neglected the problem of the aging younger generation and the Federal taxpayers. Some Resolutions were passed which stated that problems of the elderly, as well as the problems of the coming generations could best be solved by reestablishment of a sound American economy and by giving more responsibilities for funding and management of social problems to the states and local governments, in cooperation with church and charitable organizations, non-profit organizations, and volunteers. I strongly support these Resolutions.

One of the important and worthwhile recommendations of the Conference came from Committee No. 2, which stated that the fiscal integrity of the Social Security Retirement System must be re-established and maintained without the support of General Treasury Funds.

While several recommendations were made to provide financial stability of this Fund without the use of General Treasury Funds, it is my opinion that a combination of the following actions by the Congress will be necessary to achieve this end:

1. Reduce early retirement (age 62) benefits to 55 percent of the amount of full term (age 65) benefits received instead of the 80 percent now in use.

2. Reduce Minimum Benefits now arbitrarily set at $122.00 per month to a more realistic and fair figure, based on length of time and amount contributed by the employee.

3. Eliminate gradually the earnings test as an incentive to a longer working period for Social Security Retirees.

4. Tax and other benefits be given to persons who voluntarily continue employment beyond the age of 65.

5. Revise the cost-of-living formula, now based on the Consumer Price Index, to a lower and more realistic percentage of the inflation rate. This should apply to Civil Service and the Congressional retirees too.

6. Overall I feel that implementation of the many recommendations made which would provide for retirees a happier, healthier, and more useful life must necessarily be postponed until the economy improves, i.e., balanced budget, decreased unemployment, an increased G.N.P., and decreased tax burdens for those of the coming generations.●

THE CHURLS OF THE PRESS

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Speaker, columnist Tom Braden has written a painfully personal remembrance that merits the consideration of my colleagues.

The recent resignation of National Security Adviser Richard Allen prompted Braden to recount the night that Robert Kennedy was shot. In a brief but moving column, Braden describes the visceral behavior of the media at a time of terrible tragedy for the Kennedy children.

Braden's message is not lost.

As he so eloquently notes:

Some owner of a network or a chain of newspapers is going to wake up one morning and say, "This has gone far enough. I'm going to propose a code of ethics for my profession and a watchdog to enforce it and we're not going to do this sort of thing any more." Or am I mistaken? Isn't there anybody out there in an ownership position who is possessed of guts?

The article, from the January 9 edition of the Washington Post, follows:

THE CHURLS OF THE PRESS

(By Tom Braden)

Richard Allen was telling me the other day about his treatment at the hands of the press, and as I was listening I found my mind going back to that night in June of 1968 when Robert Kennedy was shot.

I've forgotten how my wife and I happened to take temporary custody of two Kennedy children that evening. Emotion blurred the memory of events as fast as events took place.

At any rate, there we were in a cottage on the hotel grounds, and we were very careful to engage our charges in conversation and not to let them turn the television on.

After a while the telephone rang and somebody who was with Mrs. Kennedy asked us to bring the children to her. I remember well what happened when we opened that cottage door.

Flashbulbs popped. Men clambered out of bushes, shouting at the children: "How do you feel about your daddy being shot?" "Which one are you?" "Have you prayed for your daddy?"

That was the way those children heard the news.

I remember being so angry as we hastened down a sidewalk to a car that, stupidly, I tried to take a swing at a cameraman, though I was carrying a child in my arms. But I also remember being ashamed. These men were reporters. Yet here they were reducing themselves to the level of purse snatchers, second-story men, child abusers.

And though I don't mean to compare the ordeal of Richard Allen with that of the Kennedy family, it seems to me that in both incidents the question to be asked is "why?"

Why did reporters do what they did to those two children? Why did they stand outside Richard Allen's house, climb trees to look into his windows, dump their half-eaten sandwiches and paper cups all over his lawn and follow him to a restaurant, listen to his conversation and inquire of the proprietor as to whether he had paid his bill?

I have asked this question of my colleagues in print, television and radio, and they answer as one: "If we didn't stake Allen out, somebody else would. If one Los Angeles newspaper had not staked out those Kennedy kids, some other paper or TV station would have, and if one got a story or a picture and the other didn't there'd be hell to pay."

In short, so I am told, competition is what turns gentlemen into churls.

I do not think this a sufficient answer. I know many a newspaper publisher, many owners of television and radio stations. I know the heads of the three major networks. Not one of them would be caught dead peering through somebody's window, abusing a child or dumping garbage on a lawn.

Then why do they permit these deeds to be done in their name?

Some owner of a network or a chain of newspapers is going to wake up one morning and say, "This has gone far enough. I'm going to propose a code of ethics for my profession and a watchdog to enforce it and we're not going to do this sort of thing any more."

Or am I mistaken?

Isn't there anybody out there in an ownership position who is possessed of guts?●

COSPONSORSHIP OF H.R. 5165—REPEAL OF THE TAX CREDIT LEASING PROVISION OF THE TAX RECOVERY ACT

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I am today announcing my full support and cosponsorship of my good friend JOHN DUNCAN's bill, H.R. 5165, to repeal the tax credit leasing provision of the Economic Recovery Tax Act that both bodies passed this summer. I want to ask my colleagues a question: Should we be giving the equivalent of food stamps to large corporations in this Nation?

The former Commissioner of the Internal Revenue Service has dubbed this provision the "rent-a-deduction" of the Tax Act. It will permit corporations to buy and sell Federal tax credits as though they were stocks, bonds, or bushels of wheat. It helps corporations all right: Two kinds of corporations. It helps wealthy, prosperous companies who do not need help in the first place, and it helps inefficient, noncompetitive firms who do not deserve any help. It benefits only those corporations who wish to shelter their profits, and firms that have done so poorly in the marketplace that they have no profits from which to deduct their credits.

This provision was added with the best of intentions: Like many Government programs, it had come from a good heart. But it did not come from a clear head. The administration estimated that this little provision would have cost $27 billion between now and 1986. That estimate has since doubled since wealthy companies have taken advantage of this provision.

Let us look at what could have been done with this $54 billion. That amount is more than four times the projected deficit in the social security OASI trust fund in the next 5 years. That same $54 billion would fully fund for the next 20 years a program of basic educational opportunity grants to needy college students at the current budget level.

There is, however, one group of people who are benefiting by this gift. Those are the corporate attorneys who arrange these giveaways. The typical fee for arranging one of these deals is one-quarter of 1 percent of the tax credits involved. At that rate, corporations will pick up $67 million in fees over the next 5 years.

Sixty-seven million dollars. We are slashing legal aid for the poor, and on the other hand we are giving money to huge corporate firms. Mr. Speaker, there is more than a little bit of unfairness there.

This tax loss has a direct and heavy impact on the Federal budget deficit. Unless this loophole is closed, every tax dollar lost through it must be made up either by further cuts in Federal programs or increasing taxes. Or, there is another choice. We can add it to the Federal deficit. I do not think any of us want to be that irresponsible.

You know, Santa Claus came about 5 months early to large corporations in this country. I think it is about time that we let them know that Santa Claus does not exist.●

GAO FLUNKS COLLEGES ON STUDENT AID

HON. BILL FRENZEL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, the Washington Post article of December 20, 1981, which follows, discusses a new General Accounting Office report on student aid made at the request of Senator HATCH.

It shows widespread abuse of student aid programs. About 20 percent of Pell grant recipients studied had less than the 2.0 grade point required for graduation; 10 percent had less than 1.5.

These startling figures will not help higher education authorities who are now speaking out strongly against further cuts in college assistance program.

The article follows:

GAO REPORT FLUNKS COLLEGE ON STUDENT AID STANDARDS

(By Charles R. Babcock)

One student at Boise State University in Idaho who received more than $4,200 in federal aid while in school got a degree in social science after taking 13 physical education courses including "Coed Bowling," "Coed Billiards," "Advanced Weight Training" and "Coed Jogging."

His best grades were in independent study courses on "Sexuality and the Male Athlete" and "Behavior of the Christian vs. Non-Christian Child." He got 4 Fs, 11 Ds, and withdrew from eight courses; the school waived its usual standards to let him graduate.

A student at Morris Brown College in Atlanta collected nearly $16,000 in government aid in five years, but earned only 65 credit hours and had a 1.35 grade point average. During his last two years, he passed only one course and should have been ineligible for his last $9,000 in federal assistance.

A student at State Community College in East St. Louis, Ill., received $8,400 in seven years while completing only 35 of 215 credit hours. She took the same speech course eight times and the same sociology course five times without passing either.

Another student at Morris Brown received nearly $12,000 in aid in three years, but because of withdrawals earned only 14 credit hours with a .62 grade point.

A new General Accounting Office report cites such examples to support its conclusion that some schools have set inadequate "academic progress standards" for students receiving federal financial aid and have failed to enforce the standards set. As a result, it said, many students are abusing programs that totaled nearly $8 billion in fiscal 1980.

Too often, it said, students whose grants it reviewed had low grade points, or withdrew or failed so many courses that they were far behind any generally accepted pace toward graduation. About 20 percent of the Pell grant recipients studied had less than the 2.0 grade point required for graduation, and about 10 percent had less than a 1.5, a D+.

Although the report made no attempt to project its results nationwide, it estimated that millions of dollars are being spent unnecessarily on students who probably won't graduate. The problem, it said, "threatens to undermine the integrity of the financial aid programs."

The study was begun by GAO and completed for Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah), chairman of the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee. It contained examples without the names of the schools or students because it was trying to illustrate a potential national problem. The students' names are protected by the Privacy Act. The schools' names were supplied by other sources.

During their survey GAO investigators examined a random sample of nearly 6,000 student transcripts at 20 colleges scattered across the country. They ranged from the University of Florida and Southern Illinois University to Miami-Dade Community College and Xavier University in Cincinnati.

Presidents of the affected schools expressed disbelief or chagrin at the news in the report. Rosetta Wheadon, head of State Community College, said she couldn't believe a student could go to her school for 7 years and earn only 35 hours.

Robert Threatt, president of Morris Brown, acknowledged that "to some extent, maybe we didn't monitor satisfactory progress as closely as we could have." But he said the school had tightened its standards.

Richard Rapp, financial aid officer at Boise State, said he didn't recognize the student from his school but said "there's bound to be some cases" on a campus where one-third of the 12,000 students receive financial aid.

Of the grants that were reviewed, $3.9 billion worth were administered by the Department of Education; $2.3 billion by the Veterans' Administration, and $1.6 billion by the Social Security Administration. Several million college students receive such grants each year.

The GAO concluded that the VA had the best standards, but said a uniform federal policy on "academic progress" is needed. Supporters of the programs responded that stricter voluntary guidelines had been approved for many universities and colleges earlier this year.

The report comes at a time when budget director David A. Stockman has proposed cutting the basic Education Department program for low- and middle-income students, the Pell grant, from its current $2.6 billion a year to $1 billion in fiscal 1983.

Jack Peltason, president of the American Council of Education, an umbrella group for higher education, said that such cutbacks would be a "revolutionary" change in the relationship between the federal government and the higher education community. "The states and the private sector couldn't possibly pick up the slack," he said.

He fears that as a result only children from wealthy families will be able to attend top private colleges, he said.

Charles Saunders, ACE director of government relations, said the proposed cuts would slash the Pell recipient rolls by 70 percent, or 1.9 million students, and lower the income eligibility to $6,000, below the poverty level.

Peltason said that the nation's universities "do not countenance any kind of cheating and we have moved vigorously to stop it. But if you have millions of students getting grants there are going to be some abuses."

James Moore, a Department of Education student aid official, said voluntary standards developed by ACE to monitor academic progress would be included in regulations the department expects to issue early next month. "Then we'll have to burn a few institutions to make them know we're serious," he said.

Moore said that if department auditors found students receiving aid in violation of the academic progress standards, their schools would be forced to pay back the grant money. "There will be a few public hangings," he said.

Because of the proposed cuts in student aid, he noted, "schools will darn well have to put their money on the front runners" and not on those who aren't serious students.●

THE 16TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE SIGNING OF THE CUBAN EXILES' DECLARATION OF FREEDOM

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, January 23, 1982, marked the 16th anniversary of the signing of the Declaration of Freedom by Cuban exiles in Key West, Fla. The location is not incidental, for the signing took place in the same historic San Carlos Club where, back in 1892, Cuban patriot Jose Marti declared the independence of Cuba from Spain.

The action by Cuban exiles lies squarely within the ideals which founded our country, for starting with the Pilgrims, men and women from around the world have fled oppression in their homelands and come to America both to find freedom and to cherish it.

The Cuban exiles have honored that tradition, both in the ideals which mark their own declaration—democracy, human rights, fundamental freedoms for all—and in the remarkable success they have had in becoming part of, and contributing so greatly to, the ongoing reality of the American dream.

Unfortunately, the sad, sorry, tragic situation of betrayed promises and broad oppression continue in Cuba to this day, as exile, imprisonment, or worse remain the lot of those Cubans who dare to oppose the Castro dictatorship or merely to seek freedoms we in this country take for granted.

This anniversary therefore marks an appropriate occasion for us all to remind ourselves both of the lamentable situation of Cuba and of the principles and purposes we proudly share with the Cubans in their exile. I urge the attention of our colleagues to their Declaration of Freedom.

The declaration follows:

DECLARATION OF FREEDOM

In the City of Key West, Monroe County, State of Florida, United States of America, we the Cuban exiles in the United States, in the name of God Almighty, and speaking both for ourselves and the oppressed people in Cuba, the Martyr Island, do say:

That on January 1st, 1959, the slavery yoke that came from Europe and was extinguished in Cuba at the end of the 19th century was resumed.

That those responsible for this high treason to our Fatherland and to our People are just a score of traitors who, usurpating the Government of the Country have been acting as mercenary agents for the Sino/Soviet imperialism, and have surrendered to that imperialism our Freedom and our Dignity, also betraying the American Hemisphere.

That as a consequence of this high treason, those who are usurpating the Power in Cuba (as they were never elected by the People), are imposing a regime of bloodshed, terror and hate without any respect or consideration to the dignity of the humam being or the most elementary human rights.

That in their hunger for power, these traitors, following the pattern of totalitarian regimes, are trying, within Cuba, to separate the Family, which is the cornerstone of actual society, and at the same time, are poisoning the minds of the Cuban children and youth, in their hopes of extending the length of time for this abominable system.

That the rule of the Law has been wiped out in Cuba, and it has been replaced by the evil will of this score of traitors, who are acting under orders from their master, the Sino-Soviet imperialists.

In view of the aforegoing, we declare.

First: That the actual Cuban regime is guilty of high treason to our Fatherland and to the ideas of the Freedom Revolution which was started on October 10th, 1868.

Second: That this score of traitors who have committed treason against our Fatherland, in case they survive the downfall of their regime, will have to respond, even with their lives before the Ordinary Courts of Justice of Cuba.

Third: That as the Noble Cuban People will not ever surrender, because that Nation was not born to be slaves, we, the Cuban People, hereby make the present declaration of freedom.

We hereby swear before God Almighty to fight constantly, until death comes to us to free Cuba from Communism.

The fundamentals of this Revolution for Freedom are.

First: God Almighty, above all things, in Whom we believe as the essence of Life.

Second: The Fatherland, will all of its laws, traditions, customs and history as a spiritual value, only surpassed by the concept of God.

Third: The Family, as the cornerstone of the Human Society.

Fourth: Human Rights, for each and every citizen, regardless of race or creed.

Fifth: The Law, as the foundation for the proper development of the Human Society.

Sixth: Democratic Government, with its three independent branches: Legislative, Executive and Judicial.

Seventh: Representative Democracy, through the exercise of Universal Suffrage, Periodically, Free and Secretive, as the expression of Popular Sovereignty.

Eighth: Freedom of Worship, Freedom of Teaching, Freedom of the Press and Free Enterprise.

Ninth: Private Property and Ownership, as the basic expression of Liberty.

Tenth: The improvement of living conditions for both rural and city working masses, with the just and necessary measures, keeping in mind the legitimate interests of both Labor and Capital.

Eleventh: The derogation and eradication of anything which is opposed to the political and religious fundamentals aforementioned and specifically, the abolition of Communism and any other form of totalitarian manifestation.

Signed and sealeld in Key West, Florida, on the 23d day of January, 1966.●

THE VIEW FROM $204 A WEEK

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, the January 18 edition of Newsweek carried a perceptive, well-written essay by Mrs. Vicki Williams of Andrews, Ind. Mrs. Williams, who works in an electronics factory in Huntington, Ind., has eloquently presented one citizen's view of the social programs her tax dollars support. I insert Mrs. Williams' essay into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and commend it to my colleagues in the hope that they will read it carefully and give full consideration to its message:

THE VIEW FROM $204 A WEEK

(By Vicki Williams)

I consider myself the classic "poor overburdened taxpayer" that you hear so much about these days. I work for an electronics company and make $6.58 an hour which translates into $204 per week after deductions, $30.21 of which are Federal withholding taxes. I have a husband, laid off, whose unemployment compensation has run out, and a 13-year-old son who thinks he should have a leather coat, a P.K. Ripper motocross bike, a Pioneer stereo and an Asteroids game. It bothers me a lot that I can't afford to buy him any of these things. It also bothers me that I'm not sure how we're going to fill up the fuel tank often enough to stay warm this winter.

There is something else that bothers me, though not to the same extent as my son's unfulfilled desires or the ever-hungry fuel tank, and that is that every single politician and editorialist is positive he knows exactly what I think. Everyone seems to be wildly anxious to be my spokesman. Yet these people don't know a damn thing about how the "poor overburdened taxpayer" thinks or lives. I imagine it's been quite some time since most politicians or well-known journalists lived on $204 per week, though I've read plenty of complaints from congressmen about their meager salaries. One even said he had to sleep in his office because he couldn't afford to buy a house. Do you know how much pity I can spare for a senator who can't live on $60,000 a year?

TIRED

I know I'm not as articulate as the people who write the editorials for newspapers and the speeches for politicians, but just once I'd like to have on the record the thoughts of an average taxpayer. I'm tired of these people putting their words in my mouth and their thoughts in my head.

One of the statements I read and hear most often is how fed up I'm supposed to be with the amount of my taxes that goes toward welfare, food stamps, programs for the elderly, subsidized school lunches and other supportive social services. Wrong! What the people "up there" don't understand is that I identify with the beneficiaries of these programs much more than I do with the politicians and the media people. "There, but for the grace of God, go I." So far, I have never had to rely on welfare, free lunches or Medicaid, but I very well might someday. When I was divorced, I could have qualified for welfare. Fortunately, I had parents who were in a position to help, but if I hadn't, you can believe I would have swallowed my pride rather than watch my son go hungry. People like me, who live only a hairbreadth from economic disaster, are glad those programs are out there, though we pray we'll never have to use them. We feel sympathy for the ones who do.

In 1977 my sister-in-law was abandoned by her husband. Her health did not permit her to work full time, so she drew $194 per month from the welfare department to support herself and her child. I doubt that anyone can think she lived extravagantly on $194 per month.

I think it's possible that at least one of the very same politicians who are now complaining about welfare recipients might have taken a political junket during one of the months that my sister-in-law and her son lived on $194. Believe me, I resent that junket at my expense much, much more than I resent helping an ADC mother, or buying eyeglasses for an elderly person or free lunches for a ghetto child.

To me, Reaganomics is cruel and self-serving. Reagan seems to be telling us that the United States is a sinking ship and that if we harden our hearts and throw a few people overboard, we can lighten the load. Then, possibly, the Ship of State can sail back to shore. I don't see my country quite that way. The philosophy behind the original structure of the United States is that we are a people who sink or swim together. We don't make human sacrifices.

If there is even one child in this country who is hungry or one old person who needs medical care, then I want my $1,570.92 in taxes to go toward helping that child or that old person. I think this country is based on the philosophy that when that $1,570.92 is gone, we will find more to take its place, as long as the need is there.

I know about the cheaters. There are always cheaters. They are a part of life as surely as death and taxes. Certainly, if they are caught, they should be punished and denied aid, but I know we'll always support some cheaters along with the "truly needy."

If we have to give a free lunch to one child whose parents could afford to pay in order to give free lunches to nine children who genuinely deserve them, so be it.

BENEFITS

The much-touted tax cut doesn't make sense to me. Perhaps there's a complicated economic formula that explains the logic of a tax cut at the same time we're slashing Federal programs because of lack of funds, but if so, I missed it. I pay $30.21 per week to the Federal government. As I understand it, when all the tax cuts are in effect, I will only pay $22.66, giving me $7.55 extra to save or spend. Well I could do a few things with $7.55 a week but, had I been consulted, I would have just as soon paid it and kept the food-stamp program or veterans' benefits intact. I suspect that the government will give it to me with one hand and take it away with the other.

You see, I really believe that most politicians and media people think that those of us out here in America who work in the factories and offices are ignorant. I believe that they think we will never catch on to their sleights of hand. I believe that they think they can tell us the grass is black one day and white the next and we'll never trust ourselves enough to look down and say, "Why, that grass isn't black or white—it's green!" Well, we know the grass is green. We just don't know what to do about it.

We don't really believe that 56 oil companies recorded 98 percent of the increase in all corporate profits from 1978 through 1980 for our benefit. We don't believe the tobacco subsidy is for our benefit. We don't believe that congressmen who were violently anti-AWACS magically changed their minds for our benefit. We know it's always us who pay the bills that result from the politicians' machinations.

I wish a politician would come along who'd tell me that the grass is green.●

A SENSIBLE, BUT HARD-LINE APPROACH TO FOREIGN AID

HON. NEWT GINGRICH

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, the United States is currently looking for a proper approach to foreign aid. One of the most compelling approaches I have noticed was stated in a recent Newsweek article by Dr. Garrett Hardin. I am inserting this article into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with his permission, so that my colleagues will have a chance to examine Dr. Hardin's theories on foreign aid.

The article follows:

THE TOUGHLOVE SOLUTION

(By Garrett Hardin)

Why should the United States be concerned with the suffering of poor countries? Two sorts of reasons are given, one moral and the other prudential.

The prudential reasons are plausible, but basically unsound. We are told that if we don't take care of a poor nation it might attack us. Nonsense. Modern warfare is so expensive that even rich nations cannot afford it. If a poor country can't afford bread, it certainly can't afford guns. International terrorism comes cheaper, of course. So long as there is envy in the world—which is forever—terrorism will be a tempting option. The answer to terrorism is police action: this is not a perfect answer, but it is the best there is.

What about this: "If we don't take care of poor people in their own countries, won't they migrate into ours?" Unfortunately, there are 2.5 billion poor people in the world, and they are increasing by 40 million per year. We cannot possibly keep up with this need. Our responsibility is to keep our country from being overwhelmed by immigrants. The responsibility of each poor country is to keep the excess population from being produced.

LESSON

What remains are the moral reasons for helping other countries, and these are weighty. But we must remember what we have learned from domestic experiences: we can't solve social problems by blindly throwing money at them. We've had a salutary lesson in the development of India and China during the past three decades. Since 1950 India has received massive foreign aid from many countries, but China from only one country (the Soviet Union) and that only until 1957. At the outset the two countries were equally miserable and had equally poor prospects. Today? Without question the people of China are far better off. Foreign aid did not rescue India from poverty; lack of aid did not handicap China. In fact, it may be that China did so well precisely because she was not "helped" by "aid."

Back in 1945 Mao Tse-tung committed China to a policy of "regeneration through our own efforts." Fertilizers and factories are splendid things, but far more important than technology is what is inside the heads of men and women. Foreign aid can supply technology: the people must be willing to make the social changes that will make technology work.

It is essential that we distinguish between crisis and crunch. When an earthquake killed 23,000 peple in Guatemala in 1976, that was a crisis. The world responded generously, and it should have. But when thousands—or millions—of people die of starvation in an overpopulated country like Bangladesh, what we are confronted with is not a crisis but a crunch. Ninety-four million Bangladeshi live in an area the size of Iowa—which has only 3 million people. Bangladesh, with its fertile soil and a climate that permits three crops a year, is a rich country, but not rich enough to add three-quarters of an Iowa every year to a population already 30 times as large. Direct food aid to such a country merely subsidizes further destructive population growth.

Sensing that gifts are bad, we generate euphemisms to hide our tracks. "Concessionary rates of interest" is a euphemism; anyone who can borrow money at 3 percent when the going rate is 8 percent is getting a gift. Poor countries ask for, and get, loan after loan. As their debt mounts, the burden of "servicing the debt"—paying the interest—becomes unbearable. Finally, since foreclosure is out of the question, the lender has no choice but to forgive the debt.

DRUGS

Way back in 1953 John Foster Dulles saw the direction foreign aid was taking. "You know," he said to a friend, "aid is like opium. There are withdrawal pains when you remove it." I think we have now reached the stage when foreign-aid addicts should be subjected to the "cold turkey" treatment. Most of the world's wretchedness is caused by the crunch of overpopulation, which will only be made worse by the drug called "aid." That this drug is addictive is shown in a statement made by the President of Kenya in 1980: "No country can maintain its economic independence without assistance from the outside." What a long way from Mao, and what a curious definition it implies of "independence"!

Now that rich countries are catching on to the corruption of the word "loan," poor countries are taking a different tack: they are demanding concessions in foreign trade. They want to be paid more than market prices for their exports and to buy at less than the market—gifts under another name.

Times are changing. Notice what is happening to parenting. We are relearning what has been known for thousands of years: love must be combined with discipline. Recently, a group of American parents, driven to distraction by their children's drug taking and rampant hedonism, joined forces to lay down the law to their children—with love. These parents meet to exchange ideas, and they meet with their children to say, "Shape up or ship out." significantly, the parents called their organization Toughlove.

COURAGE

Toughlove parenting is perilous, but it has at least the possibility of solving problems permissiveness has created. Toughlove takes courage. some of the children clear out. This is hard on parents, but they accept the risk because the alternative of continuing to support irresponsible behavior is worse.

Relations among nations must be guided by Toughlove, too. Spokesmen for poor nations now threaten us with the loss of their love if we do not give them everything they demand. We must be prepared to lose their love out of genuine concern for the long-term interests of their people. Most of the poor countries are, in fact, rich—rich in natural resources. It is their governments, usually, that are poor.

To realize a country's inherent richness, a government must see to it that population matches the carrying capacity of the land. China has shown how to use incentives and discentives to work toward this goal. China's methods may not be acceptable everywhere, but the goal should be universal. Each country must choose the means that meshes with its culture. Outsiders can furnish the technology of birth control, but population control must grow out of the will of the people, expressed through their political decisions.

There is no survival without self-reliance, which cannot be donated from the outside. Self-reliance must be generated inside each nation, by the people themselves. There is no other way.●

PAYING TRIBUTE TO DONALD SCHRADER, STOCKTONIAN OF THE YEAR

HON. NORMAN D. SHUMWAY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, it is with both pride and pleasure that I ask my colleagues in the House of Representatives to join with me in paying tribute to Mr. Donald Schrader of Stockton, Calif., who has been selected to receive the Stocktonian of the Year Award for his outstanding contributions to our California community.

Don's donations of time, ability, and philanthropic concern have certainly earned him this distinction, which is but one of many well-deserved honors he has received through the years. For the past decade, Don has served as a vital and effective coordinator of the Special Olympics, accompanying retarded youngsters to Los Angeles for participation in that heartening event. Don is also a director of the San Joaquin County Association for the Retarded. Don's exceptional work with retarded individuals was honored in 1975, when he was honored by the Council for Exceptional Children for his work with these youngsters. Don's many contributions and efforts to improve the lifestyle of retarded individuals and their families are not only helpful, but based on personal experience: Don's oldest child, now 22 years old, is so handicapped.

Don Schrader's civic involvements are not limited to aiding the retarded, however. He has participated in virtually every aspect of community life geared to guiding America's youth, from the St. Mary's High School Parents Council to the Pacific Athletic Association, and including such groups as the Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts, Blue Birds, Cub Scouts, Y Indian Guides, Campfire Girls, and Little League teams. He has also continuously supported hockey and high school sports in general, and San Joaquin Delta College. Don's service to public education has been honored by the local chapter of the California Teachers' Association, which presented him with the John P. Williams Award in 1972. This was particularly fitting, as Don began his working career in the teaching field before moving to California in 1965.

Today, Don is associated with McDonald's, operating 12 such outlets in San Joaquin County and in Sacramento. His story is one indicative of personal success and selfless sharing of that success and of his experience with others. He is a fine choice for the Stocktonian of the Year Award, and I am most pleased to have this opportunity to share his accomplishments with my colleagues.●

RYAN KIM

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, trustworthiness and loyalty are just two of the qualities required to attain the rank of Eagle Scout. I would like to bring to your attention one individual who displays these qualities plus many more. Ryan Kim will be honored at his Eagle Scout ceremony January 29, 1982.

Ryan Kim is 16 years old. He was born in Korea and immigrated to the United States at the age of 5, becoming a U.S. citizen when he was 12. Ryan has maintained an "A" average throughout school. He currently attends South High School in Torrance, Calif., where he is a junior. He is enrolled in honor math, chemistry, English, and American history classes. In addition to this impressive curriculum, Ryan is an aide in the chemistry lab, the public relations manager on the staff of the high school newspaper, and won his letter in track last year as a sophomore.

Outside of school, Ryan has been very active in the community, his church, and of course, Boy Scouts. In addition to being a member of Boy Scout Troop 586, Ryan Kim is also active in the Medical Explorer Scout Post 333 and volunteered at Little Company of Mary Hospital in Torrance.

Mr. Speaker, our country needs more active, dedicated citizens such as Ryan Kim. I commend him on his accomplishments and am proud to represent such a fine individual.●

KEEPING THE PROMISE OF YALTA

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. LaFALCE. Mr. Speaker, the suppression of the Polish people's attempt to wrest reform from their rulers has revived discussion of the Yalta agreements that divided Europe toward the close of World War II. Roosevelt and Churchill acquiesced in Soviet hegemony over Eastern Europe in return for what they thought were valuable concessions by Stalin: Russia's entry into the war against Japan; an agreement to go forward with the United Nations; and a guarantee to hold free elections in Poland, Hungary, Romania, and Bulgaria.

The open letter to President Reagan and Members of Congress by John F. Kopczynski, chairman of the board, St. Mary Manufacturing Corp., North Tonawanda, N.Y., published in the Buffalo News, Buffalo Courier Express, and the Tonawanda News, goes to the very heart of the matter—the promise made by the Soviets at Yalta in 1945 to give self determination to the Polish people. That promise has never been kept, but it must be. It underlies all the dificulties Poland is now experiencing.

The Polish people are a brave, courageous, religious, and indomitable people. Their yearning for freedom has not been squelched and will not be squelched by the Soviets. Self-determination is still their goal.

I direct my colleagues attention to Mr. Kopczynski's letter which follows and call for a recommitment by all nations to the agreements made by all nations 36 years ago at Yalta.

Mr. John F. Kopczynski's letter follows:

AN OPEN LETTER TO PRESIDENT REAGAN AND MEMBERS OF CONGRESS

Mr. President, Senators, Representatives, in February 1945, Winston Churchill, sitting across from Franklin D. Roosevelt and Josef Stalin at Yalta, told them: "Poland must be mistress in her own house and captain of her own soul."

Stalin responded: "Poland must be free, independent and powerful."

And Roosevelt declared: "The elections (in Poland) must be above criticism, like Caesar's wife."

Then, in a final communique, these leaders of the world powers said in one voice:

"The Polish Provisional Government of National Unity shall be pledged to the holding of free and unfettered elections as soon as possible on the basis of universal sufferage and secret ballot."

Roosevelt, Churchill and Stalin represented not only the thinking in their own countries, but also that of their allies—most of the nations of the world which together were defeating the Axis powers.

Today, hungry, cold and tormented by a bureaucratic regime not of their own choosing, the 35 million people of Poland are desperately calling for fulfillment of the promises made to them 36 years ago.

After almost four decades of unrelenting discomfort resulting from inept government, they yearn for a voice in their own destinies.

Millions have turned to Solidarity because it represents a force which might make their voices effective in shaping their government. But Solidarity simply happens to be an available vehicle for determined expression—bound to come sooner or later—of their desire for what was promised them in such clear terms at the end of the World War II.

The pledge of free elections came not just from the United States, although our country now seems alone in speaking out for the Polish people. It came from Russia, it came from Great Britain, and—in reality—it came from all the allies they led to victory.

Let those nations in that great alliance for human freedom now reaffirm the commitments to Poland.

We helped the defeated nations rebuild after World War II, with our Marshall Plan, because we knew stable, prospering countries benefit the entire world economy. Doesn't this same reasoning apply now to aiding Poland, and any other unstable, economically deprived country?

We must now assist a neglected ally, whose pilots helped win the Battle of Britain ("Never in the field of human conflict was so much owed by so many to so few"—Churchill) and whose infantry spearheaded the bloody conquest of Monte Cassino, breaking the German grip on Italy, at a cost of 4,000 lives. (The 46,000 men of the Polish Corps "fought with utter bravery and disregard for casualties"—U.S. Gen. Mark Clark).

Despite these and other important contributions to the Allied victory, the people of Poland have not received the precious right promised 36 years ago—the right of self-determination.

Mr. President, Members of Congress, we are bound by the promises of Yalta, so are the nations which directly and indirectly joined us in those promises. Please call on them now to carry out their obligation to the people of Poland—so that we can jointly help in the establishment of free elections.●

A TRIBUTE TO UKRANIAN FREEDOM AND INDEPENDENCE

HON. RONALD M. MOTTL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. MOTTL. Mr. Speaker, January 22 is the anniversary of one of the most important dates in the modern history of Ukraine: That of the rebirth of the independent Ukrainian state.

With the fall of the Russian and Austro-Hungarian empires, both of which controlled Ukrainian territory at the time, the Ukrainians, who for centuries had been resisting foreign domination of their country, took a decisive step toward insuring their national freedom. On January 22, 1918, the Ukrainians declared their full and unqualified independence from all foreign powers.

The Ukrainian Revolution took on, at once, an essentially national character. A Central Council—Central Rada—was established in Kiev and became the center of the Ukrainian liberation movement. It organized the Ukrainian National Army, established Ukrainian schools, introduced Ukrainian administrative and judicial systems, and prepared a Ukrainian Constituent Assembly. By these actions it established a full-fledged independent state: The Ukrainian National Republic.

After a heroic struggle lasting 3 years, the Ukrainian National Republic, as we all know, succumbed to the numerically superior military forces of Communist Russia.

The alien Communist power destroyed the Ukrainian national state and replaced it with a puppet and subservient government with the name of the "Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic." Even though it became a charter member of the United Nations in 1945, it is not a true government of the Ukrainian people, but an instrument of the Russian Soviet colonial empire, which enslaves and brutally persecutes the Ukrainian people.

Ukraine, with a population of 50 million, embraces 289,000 square miles, making it the largest country in Europe; in population it ranks fifth, and its natural resources make Ukraine one of the richest European countries. Its capital, Kiev, was the center of eastern European trade and culture long before Moscow was built. Despite its size and wealth, Ukraine is practically unknown; for most people it is "just a part of Russia." This gross misconception stems from the common practice of using the terms "Russia" and "Soviet Union" synonymously. This is incorrect because Russia is only one of the republics which make up the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Ever since the conquest of Ukraine by Communist Russia in 1920, the Ukrainian people have suffered political and cultural repression, economic exploitation, and all-encompassing Russification. Both the Ukrainian Orthodox and Catholic Churches were destroyed brutally. In an enforced collectivization of Ukraine's agriculture in 1932-33, some 7 to 10 million Ukrainians were starved to death by the government-sponsored famine. During and after World War II, hundreds of thousands of Ukrainians were deported, exiled or annihilated for their support of the Ukrainian Insurgent Army (UPA) and the Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists (OUN), both of which fought against the Nazis and then the Soviet Russian occupation of Ukraine.

On the 64th anniversary of the proclamation of Ukraine's independence on January 22, 1918, and the 62d anniversary of the Act of Union on January 22, 1919, whereby all Ukrainian lands were united into one sovereign and independent state of the Ukrainian people, the true ideal of Ukrainian independence lives on in the hearts and minds of the Ukrainian people, as attested to by writings, memorandums, appeals and trials of Ukrainian patriots-dissidents in Ukraine. In mid-1979, 18 prominent Ukrainian political prisoners and members of the Ukrainian Helsinki Group, appealed to the U.N. to take appropriate steps for Ukraine's secession from the U.S.S.R., which they called an "occupation government" installed by Communist Russia. In early 1980 an appeal from the "Ukrainian Patriotic Front" supporting the statement of other Ukrainian dissidents called for the secession of Ukraine from the Soviet Union.

At this time, when the free world is stunned by the Soviet seizure of Afghanistan and Moscow's readiness to move into Poland, the anniversary of Ukraine's Independence is a reminder of the fact that Moscow's aggression and conquest of independent nations is not a novel development.

In past years many U.S. Senators and Congressmen, Governors and mayors paid tribute to the Ukrainian people on the anniversary of Ukrainian Independence in official proclamations and statements, thus giving encouragement and hope to Ukrainians in their struggle for the rebirth of Ukraine's freedom and independence to which they are rightfully entitled under the law of God.

We hope that American officials will again voice their support of Ukrainian aspirations in this crucial year during which the world at-large is threatened by the forces of darkness more than ever before.●

CONGRESSMAN PEPPER'S ZEST FOR LIFE

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call attention, at this point, to an article that appeared in the Washington Post, which portrays wonderfully the personal qualities of our esteemed colleague, CLAUDE PEPPER. In the article, Colman McCarthy describes CLAUDE'S cheerful disposition, his firm commitment to his State and national constituencies, and his characteristic awareness of the national political mood.

The elderly, and, indeed, all of us, are fortunate to have a man with CLAUDE'S unswerving principles and zeal as an advocate.

PEPPER'S AGELESS ZEST FOR LIFE

(By Colman McCarthy)

Whatever your taste in politics or poetry, this was a charming moment. Rep. Claude Pepper, the 81-year-old congressman from Florida, was speaking over the phone with 89-year-old friend Archibald MacLeish. "I hope you're enjoying life," said Pepper, who placed the call from his House office to MacLeish in the poet's home in Massachusetts. "Other than your little hearing impairment, I hope your physical condition is good. You've got eight years on me! I'm only 81. You give me something to shoot at!"

Pepper laughed jovially. He chatted for 10 minutes with MacLeish. The congressman had phoned America's greatest living poet for his advice about a joint session of Congress late in January to observe the centennial of the birth of Franklin D. Roosevelt. MacLeish suggested some appropriate FDR readings, which was why Pepper had phoned.

A few days earlier, Pepper was in the national eye at the White House Conference on Aging. In the weeks before, his office had received 130 requests for interviews. For a little while, that may have made the Miami Democrat the most sought after member of Congress. But on a higher level it was a coalescence of interest in one of American politics' unique figures.

As chairman of the House Select Committee on Aging, Pepper has maintained a mountain-high vision of what government should be doing to better serve its elderly. With more than 4,000 citizens turning 65 every day, and 25 million already there, Pepper represents this national constituency as a pugnacious but reasonable advocate.

This was the committee that the House never even wanted to let in the front door. It began in the early 1970s when Sen. David Pryor (D-Ark.), then a representative, rented a trailer and held unofficial hearings. Pryor had worked incognito in a nursing home where he witnessed the shabby treatment given to the elderly.

When Pepper took over the committee, he was familiar too—in personal ways—with the abuses visited upon the old. Nearly every issue involving the elderly to come before Congress—from restrictive mandatory retirement laws to malnutrition among the old—has engaged Pepper. Behind his legislative zeal is a philosophical attachment to Shaw's notion about the old: "Some are younger at 70 than most at 17."

The hour and a half I had with Pepper the other morning was to enjoy an uplifting mixture of history lessons, political nuances and ideals of public service. Pepper gives personality to a style of hearty liberalism now out of fashion, at least temporarily.

The abandonment of liberalism by some of the younger politicians in Congress springs from two causes, he believes. First, they came to Washington not "deeply rooted in liberal convictions." And second, once here "they don't want to be identified as liberals because they think public opinion has turned away from the humanitarian influence in public affairs . . . They are fearful of their political lives, and they think that (liberalism) has come to have an unfavorable association."

Of the nine presidents Pepper has served under, he gives a low ranking to Ronald Reagan. With animation, he says that Reagan "comes the nearest to having the charm of President Roosevelt. But I would think that one would be unhappy to have it said that I'd hardly done anything that was meaningful in any affirmative way for the people of my country. Now he wants to cut more and more and more."

Pepper felt honored that Reagan mentioned him in his speech at the conference on aging. But, wistfully, he says he has never met the president. The night before our conversation, Pepper had been to the White House for "an official hosting" of the Congress. But Reagan went upstairs early and missed the chance to talk with Pepper, leaving the Senator to say: "I had rather looked forward to meeting the president."

Should Ronald Reagan's spirit ever sag in the year about to dawn, one sure pick-me-up would be a long visit with Claude Pepper.●

DEREGULATION OF FEDERAL CREDIT UNIONS

HON. DOUG BARNARD, JR.

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. BARNARD. Mr. Speaker, deregulation has been the hallmark of Congress for the last several sessions, and congressional actions regarding financial institutions have been no exceptions. One group of institutions, Federal credit unions, has been eager to accept deregulation and operate free from Government protections and restraints.

This week, the National Association of Federal Credit Unions is hosting its annual congressional caucus. I take this opportunity to commend FCU's for meeting deregulation head on and NAFCU, under the leadership of President John Hutchinson, for its role in helping FCU's adjust to changes in the financial marketplace.

I also bring to my colleagues' attention a notice of proposed rulemaking issued recently by the National Credit Union Administration (NCUA) which regulates federally chartered credit unions. NCUA is contemplating a virtual elimination of its restrictions on advertising, maturity, minimum balance, early withdrawal penalties, and other limits on share, share draft, and share certificate accounts at Federal credit unions. NCUA wants to give FCU board members the flexibility to set up savings account programs which best serve their members' needs.

I commend NCUA for taking this bold step and carrying on the congressional mandate of the Depository Institutions Deregulation and Monetary Control Act one giant step further. The Federal Government should not be deciding what savings accounts look like. Rather, institutions should be free to decide for themselves how to respond to the competition for savings.

I for one am tired of institutions which hide behind the protective skirts of Government regulation. This year, Congress will consider granting different kinds of institutions additional powers to help them compete among themselves that such legislation will be passed by this Chamber. But until institutions are eager, as are the FCU's, to embrace deregulation, they will become anachronisms and soon be replaced by new entities willing to keep up with the demands of the market.●

TO HONOR AMERICAN ADVERTISING SERVICES, INC. ON THEIR 25TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. THOMAS M. FOGLIETTA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Speaker, I address the 97th Congress today to pay tribute to a man who is a true American success story, Joseph H. Ball. Mr. Ball started it all 25 years ago with a rented desk and a $35 typewriter. Today his American Advertising Services, Inc. is a miniconglomerate with such diversified holdings as an art and design school, a promotion firm called "Whims for Rent," two business newspapers, a worldwide information network—all in addition to its full services advertising agency ranking in the upper 10 percent in its geographical area.

Joseph Ball is still the major force behind the success of his firm. He is involved in all aspects of the business, and is continually looking to expand his ventures into new and exciting areas.

The Delaware Valley has been lucky to have the benefit of his experience in the advertising field. The "Solar Utilization News" (SUN), is widely read in the Solar field; the "Advertising/Communications Times" is the leading area business newspaper for executives in marketing and related fields and is recognized as the Nation's "best regional advertising journal." The newspaper also sponsors the ACT Accolade Celebrity Luncheon which each year honors outstanding communicators. Proceeds from this event provide a scholarship to someone entering the fields of advertising or communications.

I salute Mr. Ball and American Advertising, Inc., as an inspiration to all Americans.●

WEISS URGES INDIAN POINT SHUTDOWN

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, safety risks associated with the Indian Point nuclear generating facility at Buchanon, N.Y., were the subject of 3 days of hearings held last week by a special Nuclear Regulatory Commission panel near the plant. Indian Point, sited just 30 miles north of New York City and within 50 miles of 21 million people, unnecessarily endangers the health and well-being of local residents. The plant has a history of safety errors and poor management, and inadequate emergency preparedness planning around the plant makes the potential for disaster great.

The effect Indian Point has had, and could have in the future, on public health and safety especially concerns me as a New York City Representative. I believe Indian Point units 2 and 3 pose very real dangers to the New York metropolitan region. Simple mathematics confirms that the potential for personal injury and property damage is dramatically increased by the heavy population density surrounding the plant and the plant's history of safety errors. These were highlighted in hearings following the accident here in October 1980.

This now-famous accident record has heightened concern of residents not only in Buchanon and in other local communities, but to many people in my district in New York City as well. Their concern has become even more justified by recent evidence of the poor management which was found to have contributed to the damage as well as to the risk of health hazards at the plant when a water leak at unit 2 dumped radioactive water into the environment on October 17, 1980. A representative of the office of the attorney general for the State of New York later concluded that the operating utility, Consolidated Edison, had ignored a recurring problem which led to the leak.

That accident briefly threatened widespread radioactive contamination. In addition, the costs of providing replacement power forced consumers to pay an average of 10 percent more on monthly bills. The State public utilities commission later ruled correctly that Con Ed had to refund part of the outage cost fees collected because management was partly responsible for the accident.

In March 1979 the near-disaster at the Three Mile Island Nuclear Plant jarred the American public into the realization that nuclear powerplants pose real health dangers. At the Indian Point site, the 1980 accident at unit 2 reinforced this conclusion. With evidence of mismanagement, rising electricity costs, unreliable emergency plans, and just cause to believe that the utilities were operating in disregard of public health and well-being, is it any wonder that people in this region were indignant?

For local community residents and people in New York City the growing fear and concern might have been mitigated by proper emergency preparedness planning. Unfortunately, inadequate emergency preparedness plans for the Indian Point plant have created a disaster in waiting and this fact, together with the plant's safety problems, has actually increased concern.

It is astounding that the current emergency preparedness plan all but ignores the 7 million residents of New York City. While providing only for radioactive monitoring of air, water, and food in and around the city, the plan makes no provisions for sheltering or otherwise protecting city residents from the possible health effects of radiation. If this is logistically impossible, as the industry has suggested, then this tells us that there simply is no justification for continued operation of this facility.

Even the known usefulness of potassium iodide as a radiation-blocking agent to lessen the health effects of radiation has been ignored in this plan, even though the director of the New York City Bureau of Radiation Control in the Department of Health advocates distribution of potassium iodide for protection in case of a radioactive emergency.

The monitoring system to be used in the city is, at best, vague, and the emergency plan details nothing more definite than ad hoc planning for futher or more serious emergencies. For the people of New York City this is foolishly inadequate and creates risks which need not exist.

Neither has any effort been made to undertake a public information campaign to alert those who might be affected by a radioactive release to the procedures to be followed in the event of such an emergency. Not even residents within 10 miles of the plant, most directly and dangerously threatened, have received explicit notification of procedures. Such poor emergency, preparedness planning shows utility disregard for public health and safety.

The refusal of the utilities to consider the psychological impact of Indian Point further weakens public confidence and heightens public fear. This issue of the psychological effect of nuclear plants on public health and safety really has advanced into an issue in its own right and should be addressed.

Earlier this month a U.S. court of appeals ruled that the psychological impact on local residents of operating the undamaged unit at Three Mile Island must be considered as part of the health and safety requirements of the National Environmental Policy Act. In its ruling, the court stated that an environmental study must be done by the NRC of the impact restarting unit 1 would have on "the psychological health of neighboring residents and on the well-being of surrounding communities." I strongly urge the board to give due consideration to this criteria in its safety evaluation for Indian Point.

Consolidated Edison, operator of unit 2 here at Indian Point, and the power authority of the State of New York, operator of unit 3, have recently campaigned to undermine this criteria, calling those who support it, scaremongers. The utilities' use of risk assessment data to try to minimize psychological factors in evaluating a nuclear powerplant's safety addresses only a part of the question. There is sufficient concern in the metropolitan region that Indian Point units 2 and 3 create an unnecessary and avoidable risk to merit looking beyond facts and figures and questioning whether the risks of Indian Point can be justified at all.

The justified anxiety felt in local communities and in New York City is not readily dispelled by an arrangement of facts and figures nor by name calling. The dangers of Indian Point are well beyond standard statistical measurement, and will grow as the population within 50 miles grows to a projected 24 million over the next 20 years. There is little to be gained from the Indian Point Nuclear Plant, and everything to be lost.●

TAX EXEMPTION FOR PRIVATE SCHOOLS

HON. TIMOTHY E. WIRTH

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, for more than a century, Americans have fought to end racial discrimination in the United States. The struggle has already been painstakingly long and difficult, and some Americans gave their lives. However, progress was made. That struggle has suffered a setback. Efforts to return our Nation to separate and unequal societies are gathering strength and becoming more threatening.

In this climate in which the voices of segregation are being heard once again, it is particularly distressing that some of them have now heard what they perceive as supportive statements from the highest levels of the U.S. Government.

Civil rights is of central importance to most people in the United States, and most have been deeply concerned about several actions of this administration. The announcement earlier this month that the administration was reversing 12 years of national policy and bestowing tax exempt status on two discriminatory schools hit America like a bombshell. The statements and actions which have followed in the wake of the public outcry have hardly been reassuring.

The fact of the matter is that no new legislation is needed to insure that segregated academies are denied the signficant benefits of tax exemption. Laws already on ıe books are quite clear. Title 6 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibits racial discrimination in institutions receiving Federal assistance such as tax benefits. Courts have been clear in ruling that educational institutions are eligible for tax benefits if they perform services which benefit the public. Discrimination on the basis of race is clearly not such a service.

The IRS has had the guidance it has needed to determine that more than 100 schools to date were practicing discrimination and therefore ineligible for tax-exempt status. What we do need is a reaffirmation of the IRS authority to deny tax benefits to discriminating schools and an order for the IRS to use its existing authority to vigorously enforce this policy.

Failure to enforce existing law banning Federal assistance to those who discriminate sends a dangerous message to the tiny minority who would wipe out the great progress which has been made in ending discrimination. As it stands now, even blatantly racist institutions could receive taxpayer subsidy. That would be a profound assault on the rights of all Americans, and must not be allowed to happen.●

REDUCTION-IN-FORCE PROCESS

HON. STAN PARRIS

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, this morning I participated in a hearing before a subcommittee of the House Government Operations Committee in which we discussed the various problems associated with the reduction-in-force process. I focused my remarks on the need for the Office of Personnel Management and the various agencies to aggressively implement more appropriate outplacement programs. I would like to submit my statement into the RECORD at this time.

STATEMENT OF STANFORD E. PARRIS

Madam Chairman, thank you for allowing me the opportunity to express my views on a serious matter that affects all Federal employees. The reduction-in-force process is having a devastating impact on Federal workers and their families. The problems encountered are not limited to those employees who have actually had their employment terminated. Thousands of Federal employees throughout the country are experiencing much anxiety and low morale due to the uncertainties which face them on a daily basis. I believe that the hardship and frustration could be alleviated somewhat if the Office of Personnel Management and the individual Federal agencies would aggressively implement out-placement programs.

During the past year, my office has worked closely with many federal employees, agencies, and officials from OPM in an effort to identify and solve the problems the RIF process has produced. After reviewing complaints and cirticisms for several months, it appears that federal employees need better counseling regarding employment opportunities in the private sector.

Last spring, we were all very optimistic about the pre-RIF placement effort which resulted in OPM's establishment of the voluntary inter-agency placement program (VIPP). But the VIPP Program is not as effective as we had anticipated. One major flaw in implementing the VIPP program may be attributable to agency structure itself. I strongly support the idea that closer cooperation and interaction between budget office staff and personnel office staff is necessary if we are going to have effective agency RIF planning.

It is essential that action be taken immediately before agencies take any further steps to reduce their workforce. Agency personnel offices must put forth a greater effort to assist their employees in finding positions outside of government. I would hope that the Office of Personnel Management would take the necessary steps to insure that agency personnel offices are putting forth their best possible effort.

In many instances, a RIFed federal employee is placed at a disadvantage because of the negative attitudes, reservations and misconceptions that many private sector employers possess.

Agency personnel offices recognize this situation but are not always able to counsel their employees properly, because they lack the necessary funds. I feel that agency personnel offices should make counseling the top priority, especially in the large agencies where there is more flexibility.

The majority of agency staff time seems to be devoted to developing retention registers and responding to employee requests for RIF information. Personnel officers are spending the bulk of their time implementing the RIF. The First priority should be assisting the RIFed employee in outplacement and this is not what is taking place.

There are several areas where agencies need to make changes. In many cases, outplacement staff lack proper training and numbers for effective out-placement. As a result, out-placement staff are not able to match skills and experience of federal employees to jobs in the public or private sectors. In some instances, federal agencies often require unreasonable prerequisites to qualify for vacant positions.

A few private sector out-placement specialists have assessed agency out-placement programs and have informed the Federal Government Service Task Force of their findings. These specialists maintain that agency personnel officers are preoccupied with implementing the RIF and that they delegate unprepared co-workers to handle out-placement. Private sector out-placement specialists also believe that an out-placement officer must have pre-established ties with the private and public sectors in order to uncover job opportunities and provide critical counseling to job seekers about aggressive personal marketing techniques.

Federal employees must continue their own efforts in locating employment but agencies should be devoting more and better resources to the out-placement effort. Perhaps priority should be given to placing those RIFed employees whose current jobs identify them as the most difficult to place. It has also been suggested that seminars could be held to educate private sector employers in the federal job classification system. This might help to eliminate the misconception that federal employees are not qualified for certain jobs in the private sector.

I would like to stress that the recently displaced federal employee requires individual counseling. The VIPP program was established to assist federal employees along these lines but the program has had difficulty in matching job skills with job qualifications listed by applicants. It may be that the VIPP structure is the best available vehicle for placing RIFed employees but I think it can be improved upon.

The Office of Personnel Management could help to improve the entire RIF process in a number of ways. Agencies should be required to focus more on out-placement. One way to help accomplish this would be for agencies to coordinate activities between their budget and personnel staffs so that the RIF planning processes can begin at an earlier date. OPM could also draft regulations which mandate RIF Boards upon which employees would sit. This might help stimulate agency development of better contingency plans.

It should be a management priority of all agencies to re-hire RIFed employees before considering individuals from outside of government. I would also like to see OPM and the various agencies consider job retraining in an effort to reduce the number of separations. The Civil Service Reform Act permits job retraining and I believe we could achieve significant results with a minimum investment.

I would prefer that agencies absorb their budget reductions through attrition rather than RIFs and furloughs. Priority rehiring for RIFed employees and job retraining could also ease the affect of budget reductions. If OPM and the various agencies took these steps in addition to better counseling and aggressive out-placement programs, the hardship and frustration associated with RIFs could be reduced significantly.●

VOICE OF AMERICA

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct the attention of the Members to the "Letters to the Editor" column of the Catholic Standard, published in Washington, D.C. Mr. Constantine R. Jurgela, a former employee of Voice of America, speaks out on the objectives involved in the programing of Voice of America broadcasts. I insert his very informative and interesting commentary on this subject.

VOICE OF AMERICA "TELLING THE NAKED TRUTH" DOES NOT MAKE "FANCIFUL PROMISES"

(By Constantive R. Jurgela)

The criticism of Voice of America programming (Letters, Standard 12/17) should not overlook its chartered mission, rather than imaginary, and differentiate practically the broadcasts into various geographic areas with different cultural, strategic, linguistic and political interests.

Of necessity, political objectives differ not only in various language broadcasts but in the English-language broadcasts going to different areas. It is understandable that there should be several geographic divisions with a number of different languages in each, with different objectives and different emphases.

In my 23 years of service I noted that the European division at one time embraced several branches—Western, Northern, Central and Eastern Europe. A Russian Service has grown from a branch, ultimately into a division embracing Armenian, Georgian, Ukrainian Uzeb and other services and finally practically into a separate Voice of America with its own news service, commentaries, special events and production branches.

The Arabic service at one time became nearly a 24-hour unit, like the Vietnamese service had been for awhile. The Latin American unit had its one-hour direct broadcasting, recorded programs for hundreds of radio stations in different countries. But after Fidel Castro, this unit has grown into a division with several branches broadcasting in both Spanish and Portuguese. Broadcasts in Finnish, Hebrew, Kalmuk and several other languages were discontinued.

As in every organization, there are dedicated expert public servants in the Voice of America and their are "world travelers." Directors come, they are handed facts, figures, et cetera, for testimony before Congressional committees, for public speeches. They are sent on inspection trips—while the operational aspects are handled by persons who were there since the days of FDR and Harry S. Truman. The work and morale suffer somewhat from the so-called domestic foreign service.

In my own experience, a new superior arrives, tells me he knows nothing about radio or the Baltic area, and asks for materials. A week later he tells me what to include—or drop—in programming and I refuse, since I am responsible for all broadcasting to Lithuania, and for a while to Latvia.

Believe it or not, one of the most effective writers, whose commentaries were most appreciated by the editors of services to the "captive European nations," was the late Bertram Wolfe, a former Communist and organizer for the Communist Party of Mexico.

For European audiences, the late John Albert wrote political scene commentaries, always faithfully following official policy yet written with European audiences in mind. There were a number of capable writers.

In so far as U.S. government policy in concerned, the Voice of America cannot and does not spread fanciful bluster, not substantiated by the words of the President or the Secretary of State.

It was a great pleasure for me to hear the escapes—the sailor Simas Kudirka, the oceanographer Dr. Eringis and others—commend me and the Lithuanian service of the Voice of America for telling the naked truth rather than make fanciful promises.●

INNER-CITY ENTREPRENEURS

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, it is with a sense of pride that I speak of men such as John Mariotta and Fred Neuberger as well as many other inner-city entrepreneurs who have dedicated their energies, financial resources and their talents to reviving the distressed regions of the Nation's cities. Indeed, it is just this spirit that I would like to see unleashed and supported in enterprise zones located in urban areas such as the South Bronx.

Doing business in the South Bronx is a difficult task as it is surely in many other distressed cities. The problems of poor infrastructure, crime and economic decay have all been well documented. But this task is made even harder when many corporate and government officials take a dim view toward our most economically disadvantaged places. The intensity and determination expressed by entrepreneurs such as those who are making it today in our inner-cities should be encouraged and praised. Theirs, is a story similar to many others which built our country and an indication that businesses can make it in the all but abandoned inner-city.

Today I am recommending to my colleagues an article of just such an effort entitled "It's the People That Count" which was recently included in INC. magazine. It is a most encouraging story.

IT'S PEOPLE THAT COUNT

(By Cheryl Morrison)

John Mariotta, a Puerto Rican high school dropout with three bankruptcies behind him, is still getting used to his role as president of a company that did over $12 million worth of business this year.

The president's background isn't the only unlikely thing about Welbilt Electronic Die Corp. Even less auspicious is its location. You've heard of Fort Apache, the Bronx? In 1965, as other companies were beginning to head for the suburbs with the urgency of wagon trains under attack, Mariotta and a partner founded Welbilt in a garage not far from Yankee Stadium. Each time the company has outgrown its quarters, Mariotta has reaffirmed his decision to stay by purchasing still more space amidst the rubble of an area that has become synonymous with urban blight.

Mariotta's loyalty to the Bronx extends even to his living arrangements. Though he drives an expensive company car, he and his wife still live in the same four-room apartment they moved into 16 years ago—in the same week he started Welbilt. "The only difference," he remarks, "is that 16 years ago it was $150 a month and now it's $450, and it's older and in worse condition."

How has Mariotta finally hit the jackpot? Hustle and hard work haven't hurt. As Welbilt has grown, Mariotta has put in more hours rather than fewer. "You can't relax," he says. "In business, there's no such thing as security."

According to his employees' accounts as well as his own, Mariotta is on the job night and day, keeping close watch on Welbilt's operation and staying in close touch with its 250 workers. One of the worst tasks he ever faced, he says, was giving layoff notices to some of Welbilt's workers during a tight spell a few years ago: "I had no choice. It was either that or the whole company. But I hated it. I know these people, and I know some of their families."

Mariotta was born in Spanish Harlem. His father, a Puerto Rican immigrant, was a tool-and-die maker. After serving in the Army during the Korean War, Mariotta set up a machine shop with his father and brother. The business failed. He moved to Long Island and started a company there. He went broke. He set up another metalworking business; once more he went bankrupt. "I lost my shirt on Long Island," admits Mariotta. "I came back to the Bronx licking my wounds."

Along with his shirt, however, he shed a naiveté that had contributed to his business failures. It was in the suburbs, he says, that he worked his way through "the school of hard knocks."

Some of his lessons had to do with his own limitations. Mariotta had started his Long Island firms on his own. When he founded Welbilt in 1965, he teamed up with a partner who had some business savvy.

"I'm just a tool-and-die maker," Mariotta says. "Some things I don't know about. I'm stupid, so now I get help from other people."

He sought to avoid another pitfall by dealing only with customers who have the capital to back up their orders. More than once in earlier ventures, Mariotta says, he fell prey to undercapitalized manufacturers who ordered parts, then failed to sell their products, leaving them unable to pay for the parts. "If they can't sell their products," notes Mariotta, "you've invested all your time and money for nothing. If they go down, so do you. I learned not to be hustled, not to be conned."

Nowadays, his customers have deep pockets. About 80 percent of Welbilt's work is for the government. The company makes stabilizer fins for the Navy's Sidewinder missiles and cooling kits for Army tanks. It is the sole manufacturer of a device called a Bell crank, which regulates the air intake of engines in the Air Force's F-104 and F-4 aircraft.

Mariotta produced precision metal parts for the military with his old companies, too, but he worked as a subcontractor. "Some of it was sub-sub-sub-subcontracting," he says, "and if there was a break somewhere in the chain, I'd be left whistling for my money."

As Mariotta tells it, there are two kinds of government contracts—small ones that truly are put to open bid and more substantial ones that usually go to conglomerates despite ostensibly open bidding. The small contracts, he says, "are cut down to the bone. There's no money in it." For five years, Welbilt hobbled along with small government contracts and occasional commercial jobs.

The turning point came in 1970 when Mariotta signed on a new partner, Fred Neuberger, because his original partner wanted to retire. It was through Neuberger's efforts that Welbilt got its first big government contract.

"We went to the procurement office and looked over the blueprints, and Fred picked out one that was illegible," Mariotta recalls. "Fred said, 'If we can't read this blueprint, nobody else can, either.' We put people to work on that blueprint with magnifying glasses, to figure out how to bid the job. Fred was right. Nobody else could read the blueprint, and consequently no one else bid for the job, so we got it."

Having successfully executed its first substantial government contract, Welbilt was in a better position to negotiate for other high-ticket jobs. The company also benefits from laws that set aside a portion of all government contract work for minority-run firms. The set-aside requirements apply to corporations that subcontract work for the government as well as to the government itself.

The company's most important commercial customers are General Electric's Aircraft Engine Business Group and Western Electric. Neuberger and Mariotta are ardently wooing other corporations in the aerospace industry. They would like to see the company do proportionally more work for industry and less for the government. The corporations, they're convinced, are more likely than the military to follow congressional guidelines on contracts for minority companies.

After Welbilt has done a job for a military installation, it can be pretty sure of getting repeat business—but only from that installation. "Every time we have contact with a new agency," he explains, "we have to go through the same song and dance of proving ourselves—in ways that a nonminority company wouldn't have to.

"The private corporations are skeptical, too, but they're more likely to go along with the set-asides," perhaps in part because they're afraid of losing their contracts by ignoring the rules, comments Mariotta. "Some of our commercial customers first came to us because of the set-asides," he adds, "but when they saw that we did excellent work ahead of schedule, they stayed with us because of that."

The toughest part of doing business in Fort Apache, he notes, is suffering the slings and arrows of government and corporation officials who take a dim view of the place. "The first thing they say is 'Oh my God! It's all bombed out! What kind of a company can this be?' they assume that we're all machete-swingers and spear-throwers," says Mariotta. "You say minority, and they look at you like you had two left hands. They think we're too left-handed to produce, but here we are, producing."

According to Mariotta, the people of the South Bronx are an asset rather than a handicap to Welbilt, partly because they're eager to acquire skills that will help them advance. Welbilt's employees include a score of blacks, 15 East Indians and Pakistanis, 32 Jewish émigrés from the Soviet Union (most of whom are engineers) and 10 native-born white Americans. Almost all the rest are Hispanic. About 90% of the work force comes from the South Bronx.

"The executive corps, I have to shanghai them and bring them in. But the other people are local," says Mariotta. Most, he adds, would be collecting welfare if they weren't working for Welbilt.

Mariotta tells one story after another of employees who started working for Welbilt at minimum wage and are now making $20,000 or $30,000 a year. A man he hired as a driver is now in charge of the company's shipping department. Another, who was living in a cellar and collecting welfare, now heads the purchasing department.

Not even a booster like Mariotta would claim that the South Bronx is teeming with skilled labor. In this age of high technology, tool-and-die makers are hard to find anywhere, let alone in Fort Apache. Welbilt's solution is to train its own workers, a task made easier by the company's investment in computerized machinery.

With the computerized equipment, Mariotta believes a worker "can acquire five years of expertise in six months." The sophisticated machines perform automatically many tasks that tool-and-die makers once had to perform by hand.

"Most employers that left or were driven out of the Bronx, besides complaining about the atmosphere, said that the people here cannot be trained to do skilled jobs," says Fred Neuberger. "We have proven that to be wrong."

Welbilt's employees seems to be as loyal to the company as Mariotta is to the South Bronx. "Nobody ever quits," says David Epstein, director of special projects for Welbilt. "The last guy to quit here left about two years ago."

The employees' loyalty has been carefully cultivated by Mariotta through frequent salary raises and promotions, an open invitation to see him personally about problems on the job, and a paternalism that includes lending money for car repairs, medical bills, and unanticipated expenses. Mariotta, this personal concern makes good business sense. "If people are worried, their work is going to suffer," he says. He also believes in tangible rewards for productivity, and once gave each of his 10 foremen a $1,000 bonus for each month they met their production schedule.

Since a large proportion of Welbilt's employees are members of fundamentalist churches, Mariotta set aside space and equipped a chapel for them in the plant. He says it was his own faith in God that made him try to start a company again after each of his failures.

As a test of his faith, Mariotta gives money to beggars he encounters on the street—an impulse most New Yorkers have learned to suppress. Mariotta considers these personal handouts to be different from the welfare system he deplores.

Nor does he see any contradiction between his disapproval of welfare and his enthusiastic pursuit of government aid for Welbilt. The way he views it, his company has saved the government far more in welfare payments, as well as in the cost of metal parts, than it has received in assistance.

This year set-asides account for about 40% of Welbilt's business, a percentage, says Mariotta, that is falling. In addition to the set-asides, Welbilt has benefited from a Small Business Administration program that guarantees loans for minority-owned businesses. Welbilt could become ineligible for SBA assistance and minority-business aid as early as next year, according to the partners. The company's assets grew from $589,540 in 1976 to $6,735,430 in 1980.

As Welbilt continues to grow, so does its need for space. The company's original headquarters was a 20,000-square-foot former garage. When Welbilt expanded a few blocks away to a three-story, one-acre plant formerly owned by a shoe company, it retained the old building to house one of its manufacturing operations. Now the company is taking over a third building, a former factory that, like the other two, sits virtually in the shadow of Yankee Stadium.

With this expansion in the South Bronx, Mariotta is again reaffirming his commitment to an area other executives have found inhospitable. Not once, he asserts, has he been seriously tempted to move Welbilt to the suburbs.

"These are my people," Mariotta says. "I understand them. If I run away from my people, I am running away from myself."●

S.O.S. BY THE COAST GUARD

HON. WALTER B. JONES

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the House Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, I am deeply concerned about insufficient funding for the U.S. Coast Guard.

The Coast Guard has just announced operating cutbacks which are intended to cope with a shortfall in operating funds of $45 million. These cuts will result in the decommissioning of ships, the closing or diminution of airbases, reductions in stations, the shutting of documentation and safety offices, and the elimination of 3,500 uniformed positions. There will be adverse effects in 48 States and several territories and possessions. As a result, safety of life and property at sea will be diminished and law enforcement against drug smuggling, illegal immigration and foreign fishing violations will be reduced.

The Coast Guard missions focus on defense, safety, and law enforcement. It has been clear that for sometime the Coast Guard has been seriously underfunded for the missions we in Congress had given it. Now with the just-announced cuts, its ability to respond will be curtailed even more.

Consequently, I am sponsoring, with broad bipartisan support, a supplemental appropriations bill to provide $136 million of money for the Coast Guard in the current fiscal year.

Among the cosponsors are Congressman GERRY STUDDS of Massachusetts, chairman of the Subcommittee on Coast Guard and Navigation, Congressman DON YOUNG of Alaska, ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Coast Guard and Navigation, Congressman ADAM BENJAMIN, chairman of the Subcommittee on Transportation of the House Appropriations Committee, and Congressman SILVIO CONTE, ranking minority member of the Committee on Appropriations.

This funding will not expand the Coast Guard's presence, it will merely maintain the current levels of service. In the next few days, I will be approaching my colleagues for their support for this effort. This is one area in which our citizens will not accept budget cuts which represent false economics.

I believe the editorial which appeared in the Raleigh, N.C., News and Observer on January 11, 1982, addressed this issue very well:

"S.O.S. BY THE COAST GUARD"

The nation can sleep better at night knowing the Reagan administration is guarding the coastlines. Right? Not to hear the Coast Guard tell it. The Coast Guard has announced that it will have to discharge 1,000 of its 32,500 enlisted personnel and cancel its May officer candidate school because of budget cuts.

It's a puzzle as to who in the administration could be happy about these developments given the Reagan emphasis on national defense. The nation puts a lot of dependence on the Coast Guard for patrolling the coasts and major waterways, catching drug smugglers and rescuing vessels in distress. But the service comes off in this administration as the poor relation among outfits that provide national security.

While President Reagan was boosting defense appropriations to record amounts for peacetime, the Coast Guard budget for fiscal 1982 was slashed by $46 million. Its members are paid according the military scale, but the Coast Guard received no money to cover raises enacted by Congress last year. As another economy measure, the service is considering mustering out captains who were commissioned in the 1954-56 period.

Maybe the White House knows something the rest of the country doesn't. Perhaps it has arranged for fishing fleets, shrimpers and yacht clubs to plug the gaps in the Coast Guard with volunteer services.●

CONGRESSIONAL REWARDS

HON. GARY A. LEE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. LEE. Mr. Speaker, colleagues, I am today offering for the RECORD the letter which arrived in my morning mail from an elderly upstate New York couple who read in one of my constituent newspapers about the way Congress rewards itself.

If you were one of the majority of this House who rolled over and played dead during the shameful tax and earnings benefit packages approval in this House before Christmas, I commend for your reading both the letter and the editorial comment which was attached to it, from the Corning, New York Leader.

At the same time, I urge you to investigate House Joint Resolution 344 and H.R. 4807, both of which I introduced to finally bring a measure of integrity to this House's self-reward system. I suggest you will be surprised at how simple it is to solve. You may call my office to cosponsor these. In the meantime, take a moment to compare these sentiments with those in your morning mail:

PAINTED POST, N.Y.,
January 21, 1982.

Dear Representative LEE: When we read the enclosed article about your present raises how do you think people of your district feel? Especially when the elderly—(80 year bracket) have their taxes raised and find it hard to meet and you in Congress keep lowering our benefits. Think about us.

EDITH M. NEILSON.
ARTHUR W. NEILSON.

[From the Corning, (N.Y.) Leader, Jan. 21, 1982]

BLATANT RIPOFF IS PERPETRATED

Members of the U.S. House of Representatives and Senate can now legally rip off the taxpayers even more flagrantly than they have been doing for years.

The Internal Revenue Service has come out with new regulations, retroactive to Dec. 31, 1980, that allows members of Congress to claim all expenses they can substantiate, or if that's too much work, to merely declare their expenses at $75 per day without itemizing anything.

A legislator need not be in Washington to claim the $75. The only requirement is that the period of deductible expense be within four days of when Congress was last in session.

For a typical congressman, the $75 a day will amount to about $18,000 in additional deductions.

In addition, members of Congress, most of whom travel widely, can deduct expenses for any trips outside Washington, plus interest and taxes on a Washington residence, as well as the standard deductions available to everybody else.

Members of Congress have repeatedly tooted their own horns because their $60,662 base pay level has not changed since October 1979 while inflation has upped the costs of everything else.

The reason they can hang on is because of tax breaks like this wholesale robbery of the public treasury.

And it comes after Congress removed its $3,000 ceiling for living expense deductions and at the same time, voted to throw out regulations that put a ceiling on the amount congressmen can earn from outside sources.

Oh, the poor hard working lawmakers will still have to pay taxes on income from speeches, investments and other sources, but with a tax shelter like the $75 per day rule provides, they shouldn't have any problem coughing up the cash.

You can stop wondering why lawmakers as a group always show up so badly in polls of the public's perception of various classes of society. It's because of blatant ripoffs like this.●

OPPOSITION TO PRESIDENT'S PROPOSED VOUCHER PLAN

HON. THOMAS M. FOGLIETTA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Speaker, I address the 97th Congress today to submit a letter from a constituent of mine who is concerned with the President's proposed voucher plan for housing assistance. Ms. Rosalie Cooper Lowenstein's letter provides a clear and convincing presentation of the problems with the President's plan based on personal knowledge.

To Representative THOMAS FOGLIETTA:

President Reagan's proposed Voucher Plan—if passed—will have a devastating effect on the lives of all elderly and handicapped tenants now enjoying needed benefits under the Section 8 Low Income/Low Rental Housing Program. The Voucher Plan will adversely affect those on the "Existing Housing" Program. These tenants are largely unaware that they face virtual total loss of these benefits.

Presently, local housing authorities inspect and approve existing (not new) housing, and set a ceiling rental, assuring the tenant of decent quarters for which tenant pays only 25 percent of income toward rent, the balance paid by the local housing agency (funded federally).

Under the Voucher Plan, inspection, approval and rent-ceiling would be eliminated, allowing facilities to deteriorate without monitoring, and freeing landlords of S8 tenants to raise rents unilaterally. For example, presently I pay $96.00 toward rental of a large efficiency apartment ceilinged at $255.00 My landlord could be counted on to raise my rent (and that of all his S8 tenants) to $300.00 or more. My "housing voucher" (part of the "budget cutting on behalf of the poor") could hardly be expected to exceed $50.00 or $75.00. Thus, "helped" by the Voucher Method, I would be paying $225.00 to $250.00 for rent in contrast with $96.00 I now pay.

With a social security income (my total income) of $347.00, the $96.00 per month rent has enabled me to live in a state of dignity, even enjoying many comforts in my last years. Under the Voucher Plan, I would, once again be reduced to the status of a pauper.

The aged and the handicapped are known to be terrified of another bout with the strenuous labor and excessive anxieties involved in being forced to find a inexpensive yet decent and suitable new location, packing, moving, rearranging, and adjusting (at our age) to another new environment.

Landlords are aware of the urgent (desperate) need of the Old to stay put in the comfortable environment with which (at great cost in fatigue and stress) they have only recently become familiar with.

Thus S8 landlords know they have captive tenants who will go hungry before they will move, and who will be forced to pay rents 100 percent to 200 percent greater than presently they pay under that blessed S8 Plan.

I beg of you, spread this information to all the humane Congressmen.●

ACID RAIN—MAYBE THE MIDWEST IS NOT THE ONLY CULPRIT

HON. TOM CORCORAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. CORCORAN. Mr. Speaker, in an October 1, 1981, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD statement, I expressed my concern about the increasing number of statements being made about the issue of acid rain and its supposed health and environmental effects. I am particularly concerned that Eastern States seem to be pointing to Midwestern States as the sole source of acid rain.

In this connection, I have recently been made aware of a November 23, 1981, preliminary report of a study being conducted by the University of Rhode Island on the long-range transfer of sulfates in the atmosphere. This effort is being conducted by Mr. Kenneth A. Rahn of the Center for Atmospheric Chemistry Studies of the University of Rhode Island's Graduate School of Oceanography.

The preliminary results of this study indicate that acid deposition in the Northeastern States may be derived from sulfur dioxide emissions of local origin rather than from the Midwest as is commonly perceived. Preliminary data from receptor points in Massachusetts and Rhode Island suggest that sulfates in the atmosphere contain little trace of the signature of sources in the Midwest. Some traces of emissions from Canada are found, but the remainder seems to be of local origin. Particularly in view of this kind of information, I continue to urge my colleagues to carefully consider the ramifications of any proposed Federal legislative action on the issue of acid rain.

Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of our colleagues, I insert the text of Mr. Rahn's statement of new evidence on the acid rain issue.

ELEMENTAL TRACERS AND SOURCES OF ATMOSPHERIC ACIDITY FOR THE NORTHEAST—A STATEMENT OF NEW EVIDENCE

(By Kenneth A. Rahn)

During the last several years, a picture of acid precipitation in the Northeast (here defined as the six New England States plus New York and New Jersey) has been built up which attributes the major sources to the Midwest, some 1,000 km distant. Evidence in support of this view is now massive, and includes the strength of SO_2 sources in the Midwest (more than five times as much as in the Northeast), association of highest concentrations of sulfate aerosol with airmass trajectories from the Ohio River Valley, and "blobs" of sulfate haze which can be followed from the Midwest to the Northeast. During the last two years, an impressive number of articles has appeared in scientific and popular publications attesting to this picture. As a result, two bills have recently been introduced in the Senate (Mitchell et al., and Moynihan), each of which would place the burden of curbing SO_2 emissions on the Midwest.

Although widely accepted, this picture may be weaker at its core than is generally realized. The evidence for midwestern sources of acidity is quite indirect and circumstantial: (1) Just because the Midwest emits five times as much SO_2 as the Northeast, it does not automatically follow that northeastern acidity should be dominantly midwestern in origin—the 1,000-km distance from the Midwest must negate much of this difference, especially in summer, when weaker circulation favors local pollution; (2) The argument from air-mass trajectories implies little about whether a pollutant at the end of the trajectory has actually travelled the entire distance; (3) Tracking a blob of haze is not hard proof either, for there is no way from photographs or visibility alone to determine how often the blob has renewed itself during transport. A blob may represent movement of certain meteorological conditions as much as it represents transport of mass.

During the last decade, our understanding of the true role of long-range transport in air pollution has increased dramatically. Much of this knowledge has come, however, from studies of areas such as Scandinavia or the Arctic, whose sources of pollution are relatively easy to assign, because there is a single strong source far upwind and clean areas between it and the remote receptor region. But in the eastern United States there are no such clean areas; air travelling long distances is inevitably exposed to emissions all along its path. This makes it much more difficult to assign sources properly.

Everybody agrees that acid precipitation has to be reduced, the sooner the better, and that this will involve curtailing emissions in the areas most responsible for it. But with such a huge price tag ($2-4 billion per year for the new bills), it would seem of the highest priority to learn with certainty which sources are most important before attempting massive remedial action. Until recently, we at the University of Rhode Island, who are staunch advocates of the importance of long-range transport of air pollution because of our research in the Arctic, would have gone along with the new bills without a second thought. But we have quite accidentally produced some new data which cast doubt on part of the current picture, and, we believe, call for a more careful look at the entire system of sources and transport of acidity in the Northeast before major control action strongly oriented toward a particular region is taken. It is the purpose of this document to alert the scientific and legislative communities to the existence and preliminary interpretation of these results.

The new evidence comes from a system of elemental tracers of source areas of pollution which we have developed for our studies of the Arctic atmosphere, to which large amounts of pollution aerosol are routinely transported long distances during winter. During the last 18 months, we have learned how to choose combinations of elements to form unique signatures of several source areas of pollution aerosol, which can be used to discriminate their aerosols from one another even after transport of thousands of km. The first such tracer we developed, the ratio of excess or noncrustal Mn to excess V (called the Mn/V ratio for short), has allowed us to resolve aerosol from the eastern United States, Europe, and the Central Soviet Union, all after transport to the Arctic. This was the first application of elemental tracers to large-scale source areas; its success has convinced us that this new approach will rapidly become a powerful tool in atmospheric science. In the future, many more elemental tracers will be developed and applied to a wide variety of problems that might otherwise be intractable.

While working with the Mn/V ratio in the Arctic, we realized that it could also be applied to regional-scale transport within the eastern United States, for the Mn/V ratios of the Midwest and the East Coast are quite different, and can be told apart easily. This approach should enable us to document the sources of atmospheric acidity with a greater resolution than was possible previously. By measuring Mn and V in the Northeast during episodes of sulfate and acidity and during nonepisodic periods, we felt that we could confirm the midwestern origin of episodes: Mn/V ratios of episodic aerosol should be midwestern, but Mn/V ratios between episodes should be more northeastern.

Only recently have we had proper data with which to do this. There are now three data sets available. The first, from High Point, New Jersey, during the summers of 1976 and 1977, showed an eightfold difference in Mn/V ratio between air masses coming from the Midwest and those coming from the East Coast. As expected, air masses from the Midwest carried higher sulfate. The other two data sets, from Watertown, Mass. and Narragansett, R.I., gave an entirely different picture, however, and had essentially no midwestern Mn/V ratios. The data from Rhode Island, which is comprised of over 60 samples spanning both summer and winter, showed no correlation at all between sulfate and excess Mn, excess V, or Mn/V ratio. Strong episodes of sulfate were seen, but they were usually accompanied by an eastern Mn/V ratio. Overall, the aerosol appeared to be strikingly eastern—at least 90 percent of the Mn/V ratios were purely eastern in summer; in winter, the aerosol was somewhat more varied but still markedly eastern. (Other elements in these samples appeared to indicate the detectability of the plume from the Sudbury, Ontario INCO smelter which emits 10 percent of the North American SO_2. Elements characteristic of this plume appeared nearly every time a strong cold front passed through Rhode Island, when the winds came briskly from the NW for a day or so. Interestingly, levels of sulfate during these periods were very low. Because of the importance of this source to Canadian-American exchange of acidity, and because it is such a striking example of the power of elemental tracers, we intend to pursue this topic.)

The Rhode Island data did contain four cases of "midwestern" Mn/V ratios, however. But only one of these could be traced to the Midwest, and that came during a period of extremely strong westerly flow during winter, and brought low sulfate. The other three cases could be traced by meteorological maps to the Southeast, via a new and unexpected type of atmospheric transport. Apparently, air from the Southeast first travelled eastward over the ocean, then northward to New England under the influence of a strong upper-level trough. This pathway allowed it to miss the entire East Coast, and hence to preserve its southeastern signature.

What does all this new evidence mean? We do not propose that it challenges the basic picture of long-range transport in the Northeast—such an allegation would be premature. But we think it is significant that the first attempt to confirm the accepted picture through direct evidence has given such unexpected results. Instead of a monolithic Midwestern source, the Northeast is now seen to have a rich variety of sources and transport, a complexity that was totally unanticipated: the Sudbury plume can be detected after transport across the entire Northeast; the Southeast pollutes New England; the East Coast pollutes itself considerably. Ironically, the (midwestern) source that we had expected to find the most easily has proven the hardest to detect.

Perhaps some of our results depend on the nature of the technique (Mn and V supply information on the primary submicron aerosol, whereas sulfate and acidity are secondary, hence may have different origins); perhaps not. But whatever the eventual outcome, it would seem prudent to exploit the new resource of elemental tracers by undertaking a systematic study of the multi-elemental composition of aerosol and precipitation throughout the Northeast and in the various possible source areas. Such an investigation should go far toward revealing the sources and transport of acidity in the Northeast.●

ROBERT F. DEANE—SAN DIEGO'S ORIGINAL MR. "NICE GUY"

HON. BILL LOWERY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of this body—and make it a part of the RECORD—the recognition being accorded to a notable gentleman of San Diego, Mr. Robert F. Deane.

Mr. Deane is, foremost, a constituent living in my 41st Congressional District and, therefore, worthy of whatever accolades may befall him. There are other civic activities in which he has distinguished himself in our home city, some of which were duly noted in a column by the well-known writer, Frank Rhoades, in the San Diego Union of Sunday, January 17, 1982.

For his civic endeavors Mr. Deane is being toasted by a gathering of friends and enemies on the evening of Friday, January 29, 1982, on the occasion of his ending a 2-year reign as president of a group called the Nice Guys. Mr. Deane was a founder of this organization, whose membership is symbolized by its title, with the possible exception of a couple of hardheads who gained entry by subterfuge, disguise, or outright lies.

The Nice Guys sponsor fundraising events for worthy causes, and a sellout was assured for this fundraiser because of the hundreds of people who would pay to get Mr. Deane out of the president's office. Most of them could not find anything better to do that evening, anyway.

An added cause for celebration is the fact, which Mr. Deane advertised widely, that January 28 marks his 50th birthday. However, he did not specify January 28 of which year, which has caused some speculation among those in the senior citizen set in San Diego. I do not wish to open a debate on the floor of Congress about a man's correct age, therefore, I will do no more than raise a skeptical eyebrow on this subject.

In addition to the Nice Guys, Mr. Deane has been active in the Boys Clubs of San Diego, the Leukemia Society, and other worthy projects. He currently serves as administrator of the senior citizens medical clinics of the city. Some of the doctors, nurses, and administrative personnel of those clinics volunteered, even pleaded, for the opportunity to enter their remarks about Mr. Deane in this space. I had to refuse them the privilege, of course, for fear the results might cause overtime pay among the congressional censors. I must admit, however, that their remarks might have made very interesting reading and perhaps would have presented a more truthful and accurate portrait of our honoree.

In all seriousness, I deem it a pleasure to recognize Mr. Robert F. Deane, and commend the attention of my colleagues in the House of Representatives to his civic good deeds and to the fine contribution he has made to San Diego.●

OPINIONS OF THE NATIONAL PTA IN BUDGET CUTS

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues a letter which I received today from the National PTA which expresses many of the opinions that I and several of my colleagues hold regarding budget cuts in the field of education. The letter is from the president of the organization, Ms. Mary Ann Leveridge, who has firsthand knowledge of the cuts which have crippled our Nation's vital commitment to education.

More than $6 billion has already been cut from the budgets of elementary and secondary education programs. The Office of Management and Budget has suggested cutting an additional $400 million from these programs.

Such massive reductions in funding can only have the most severe effects on education in this country. Cuts of this magnitude threaten to endanger our ability to cultivate our most valuable resource—our young.

I enter this correspondence into the RECORD.

The correspondence follows:

[Opinions]

THE NATIONAL PTA,
Washington, D.C., January 21, 1982.

Hon. ROBERT GARCIA,
Cannon H.O.B.,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. GARCIA: This letter reflects the National PTA's deep concern about the future of education and our Nation's children as the White House and the Office of Management and Budget prepare to recommend further federal budget cuts in education and social programs for fiscal year 1983.

We are 6 million parents and child advocates who must respond to these decisions that affect local schools, communities, and, most of all, our Nation's children. We believe that the education of our children is the most important long-term investment that this country can make in regard to our economic and democratic future.

We also believe that the Reagan administration was correct last year in highlighting crucial problems when it directed the Nation's attention to our declining productivity, the need to reinvest in our own industrial capacity, our unyielding high inflation and interest rates, unemployment figures that exceed 9 percent nationally (and more than 50 percent for minority youth), and the need to redirect efforts toward educational excellence and a more rigorous academic program for elementary and secondary school students.

Now, though, the Administration and OMB are in the process of crippling education and social programs which may lead to the demise of institutions instrumental in restoring the United States to a more prominent world economic position.

During the past twelve months, elementary and secondary education has had more than 12 percent of its fiscal year 1981 and 4 percent of its fiscal year 1982 Federal funding rescinded. In addition, the Reconciliation Act cut the school lunch program by more than 30 percent and lowered the authorization levels of every major education program by at least 50 percent through fiscal year 1984 without any hearings for public testimony. Although this already represents a $6.5 billion cut from ED's fiscal 1981 budget, OMB has recommended slashing that figure by another $400 million.

Why do we find these cuts so frightening? Primarily because these drastic cuts translate into unmet needs for children and our society. Federal spending on elementary and secondary education programs comprises little more than 1 percent of the Federal budget. Yet that small percentage translates into more than 10 percent of the average school district's budget in 1980.

Reductions contained in the recent round of budget cuts are going to shut down many school lunch programs; raise school lunch prices beyond the means of many families; deny special education to the handicapped and disadvantaged; decrease vocational education opportunities at a time when job shortages in skilled trades, engineering, and semi-skilled trades prevail; and eliminate categorical programs as a result of a 40 percent cut in monies going to local programs.

In social programs, caseloads will increase, day-care centers will be closed, juvenile status offenders will be incarcerated with hardened criminals, successful Head Start programs will be discontinued, and health care services for our most vulnerable and disadvantaged will be threatened.

These disproportionate cuts in education and social programs are targeted for the generation that represents the future of our country—children and youth, who are least able to be heard through the political process. Simply speaking, further cuts in budget or programming cannot be permitted by Congress.

As the second session of the 97th Congress convenes, you will have the opportunity to demonstrate your confidence in public education by:

1. Opposing all further spending cuts in education and social programs;
2. Supporting the Department of Education with Cabinet-level status;
3. Maintaining focused attention on the unique needs of the disadvantaged, the handicapped, and other special populations.
4. Opposing tuition tax credits.

It is taking time for our membership to recognize the implications of the unrealistic economic assumptions that will lead, eventually, to more drastic steps than those that have already been taken. We appreciate all the efforts that you have made over the holiday recess to inform your communities of what has already been done. We urge you to continue to use the Congress as a forum to inform the public. We will do all we can to help.

A strong economic system and a potent national defense depend ultimately on a strong system of public education at the federal level—as well as at the State and local levels. The educational tree required trimming, but let's not tear it out by its roots. Your support and help in making reasoned and careful decisions during these very critical weeks will be much appreciated. We will help.

Sincerely,

MRS. A. T. LEVERIDGE,
President,
MANYA S. UNGAR,
Vice-President.●

CIVICS/CLOSEUP MAGNET SCHOOL PROPOSAL

HON. LINDY (MRS. HALL) BOGGS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, as one deeply committed to the development of civic mindedness among our young people, I have been particularly impressed with the closeup program, administered by the Close Up Foundation.

This program provides students and teachers with an unparalleled opportunity to examine, understand, and participate in the political process. While it focuses on the Federal Government, the closeup program is designed to stimulate increased involvement by students and teachers at the State, local, and school level. It is the largest Government studies program for high school students and teachers in the country.

In an effort to increase participation in its closeup program, the New Orleans Public Schools System developed the "magnet school concept." This innovative plan provides for one high school in each district to be designated as the classroom site, with each high school in the district sending five students to the magnet school. In this way, resources are consolidated and experiences are shared among many.

Last Wednesday, I had the opportunity to meet with a group of young New Orleanians who have participated in the civics/closeup program offered by the Orleans Parish School System. They were an impressive group, and I think their involvement in the civics/closeup program made their visit to Washington more enjoyable and productive. Students from the following public schools in New Orleans participated in last week's Washington closeup session: Joseph Clark High School, Walter Cohen High School, Warren Easton High School, Alcee Fortier High School, Benjamin Franklin High School, McDonogh High School, McMain Magnet School, L. E. Rabouin Vocational High School, Spectrum High School, and Booker T. Washington High School.

It is with great pleasure that I refer to my colleagues the civics/closeup magnet school proposal developed by the New Orleans Public Schools System:

CIVICS/CLOSE-UP MAGNET SCHOOL PROPOSAL
(Amended Oct. 9, 1981)

For more than a year now the Civics/Close-Up Advisory Council, composed of educators and representatives of various elements of the community, has been engaged in developing a program which would both increase Close-Up participation of public school students and maximize the learning potential of the Washington experience. After considering several working proposals, the council is pleased to present a magnet school concept to accomplish this goal.

Under this design, each of the four districts of the New Orleans Public Schools will have one of its high schools designated as the Civics/Close-Up Magnet School site. (Preliminary planning has identified McMain, Carver Senior, McDonogh #35, and Landry as the four magnet centers.) At each magnet school site one Civics/Close-Up class will be conducted by a participating teacher for five students from each of the senior high schools assigned to that magnet site. These classes may be scheduled to meet fifty minutes before the beginning of the school day (7:40 a.m. to 8:30.); students would return to their district schools during the first period for their other classes. Another option would permit students to travel during the last period of the school day; the class would meet from 3:45 to 4:15 p.m. Both students and parents would agree to this travel/study period and commit themselves to raising one-half (½) of the funds required for the Washington, D.C. trip. The project will provide each student with a one-half tuition scholarship and cover the cost of travel to the magnet class and two trips to Baton Rouge. (As the program progresses, it should be possible to raise some of the scholarship funds from the local business community thus expanding the program or reducing the New Orleans Public Schools' financial burden.)

The magnet-site teachers will be responsible for planning the magnet classes, preparing local curriculum materials, securing community speakers, and coordinating the combined local and state activities. Each magnet site teacher will verify that students in that class are eligible for scholarship assistance and are engaged in raising their share of the travel expenses. In addition these teachers will handle all coordination with the National Close-Up staff.

Each participating high school will have a teacher assigned to the project. This teacher will be responsible for administrative details concerning that school's participating students, i.e. scheduling and student performance in other courses. These teachers will have direct responsibility for assisting students in raising their one-half of the travel funds. Participating teachers will accompany their students on the Washington trip.

In developing this magnet concept, the Advisory Council has consulted with various school administrators and students who would be most directly impacted by this program. Their interest and support are encouraging. Mr. Clifford Francis, Principal, McDonogh #35 Senior High School, sees the program as "a plus" for his school. He prefers the morning schedule option and "is willing to give maximum support" to the Civics/Close-Up concept. Mrs. Velma Pryce, Principal, Landry Senior High School, is excited that Landry will be a magnet school, and welcomes it as another community involved program of the school. She has pledged her full support for a before school class.

Mr. Alan Guma, Principal, McMain Magnet School, is also pleased to be involved and is willing to accommodate either a morning or an afternoon class. Mr. Henry Johnson, Principal, Carver Senior High School, believes this is an excellent idea and is "excited that Carver was chosen." He prefers the afternoon scheduling option.

Where teachers for the magnet classes have already been tentatively identified, they are pleased and excited about the Civics/Close-Up concept and eager to get underway. At Clark Senior High where the Supervisor of Social Studies discussed the program, students were enthusiastic about the magnet concept and so excited about the class that they would participate at either time option. These strong expressions of support coupled with unanimous excitement reflect and reinforce the general feelings of the Advisory Council towards this proposal.

An analysis of recent New Orleans area Close-Up participation lends urgency to this proposal to upgrade the participation level of this school system. For the 1980-81 greater New Orleans area Close-Up Program, a total of 73 schools sent 686 students to Washington. The New Orleans Public Schools' contingent consisted of 49 students representing 20 schools. The remaining 53 schools sent 637 students. This means then that high schools of the New Orleans Public Schools averaged less than 2.5 students per school while the rest of the area schools sent slightly more than 12 students per school.

These rather dismal figures are reflected in the statistics for the entire ten years of New Orleans area involvement in the Close-Up experience: New Orleans Public Schools, 3.46 students per school; all other participating schools, 10.34. The New Orleans Public Schools have averaged 65 student participants each year of the program.

This proposal's goal of a minimum of 100 students per year, therefore, represents a 50% increase over the previous ten year average. Clearly the Civics/Close-Up Program is vital if the students of the New Orleans Public Schools are to begin to reach the participation levels of the rest of the metropolitan area.

This is indeed an ambitious undertaking the Advisory Council has developed; more New Orleans Public Schools students will participate in the Close-Up experience on a higher achievement level than was possible before. Principals, teachers, students, and community members are excited about this program. I hope that the New Orleans Public Schools will act favorably on this request so that Civics/Close-Up will become a reality; this is indeed an unique opportunity for the New Orleans Public Schools and our students to form a firm partnership with the business community to improve our instructional program.●

TRIBUTE TO JOSEPH D. DUFFEY, FORMER CHAIRMAN, NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

HON. PAUL SIMON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, in December 1981, Joseph D. Duffey stepped down from the Chairmanship of the National Endowment for the Humanities. Dr. Duffey served as Chairman from 1977, during a period when the direction of Federal involvement in the humanities was subject to question and debate, in an economic climate of retrenchment and the reordering of Federal priorities. He proved a voice of reason and stability and steered the course of the Endowment along lines of academic integrity as well as public participation.

During his Chairmanship, the Humanities Endowment did what it was chartered to do: promote quality research and public involvement in the varied fields which make up the humanities.

Dr. Duffey continued the best traditions of the Endowment, developed by its initial legislation in 1965 and continued through 15 years of changing politics in the White House and Congress. In the December 1980 issue of Humanities, Dr. Duffey describes his philosophy of the Federal role in the humanities:

The implicit limitation on Federal support concerns basic freedom of expression. Scholarship in the humanities is a form of intellectual expression peculiarly needful of the protection of the First Amendment. It would be dangerous and unwise for the Federal Government to dominate the agenda which determines the areas of inquiry into philosophy and politics, into history and literature, into religion and language—not to mention ethics or the theory of the arts.

Accordingly, the NEH very early on adopted a competitive system of peer review of applications for funding. The most important effect of this system is to protect freedom of expression, to interpose a barrier between inquiry in the vast domain of the humanities and its direction by government.

Dr. Duffey continues to explain the importance of the peer panel review, a system which takes the bureaucrat and politics out of the business of choosing which projects to support:

I believe this system has worked quite well. To be sure, it has lacked the dramatic excitement of bold policy pronouncements, task force reports, and crash programs. But the combination of NEH's broad guidelines and its peer review process, while fulfilling its function of protecting free expression, has also allowed for constant evolution and change.

Dr. Duffey articulates the expansiveness and diversity of the history, philosophies, religions, and cultural heritages of this Nation and the value of all to the study and appreciation of the humanities in this Nation. His Chairmanship and the accomplishments of the Humanities Endowment well reflect his views:

America is complex. Its cultural life is not "organized" nationally or regionally, and should not be. Its hierarchies of wealth and taste are always subject to attack by newly emergent expressions of quality. Every current of the world's traditional wisdom, like every current of the world's blood, flows through our people. Let us beware, then, of oversimplification and of an historical sense of ourselves. Nothing is so valuable an antidote to those errors as witnessing the complexity and diversity of the cultural creativity which, originating in the thousands of applications addressed to the Endowment, flows through its review processes.

As chairman of the subcommittee with jurisdiction over the Endowment, I believe Dr. Duffey represents the kind of public servant of which the Congress and our constituents can justifiably be proud. We look forward to his future contributions as an interpreter and critic of culture, as an adviser on human affairs, and as a clear voice in support of the value of the humanities both behind the ivy walls of academe and in our everyday lives.●

CRITICAL ISSUES FACING AMERICA

HON. ALBERT GORE, JR.

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, on October 21, 1981, the Congressional Clearinghouse on the Future sponsored the first in an authors series featuring new books which address critical issues facing America.

Our first author was Dr. Daniel Yankelovich, founder of the Public Agenda Foundation and one of the premier social researchers in the Nation. Dr. Yankelovich directed his remarks to a discussion of his most recent book, "New Rules: Searching For Self-Fulfillment In A World Turned Upside Down."

Mr. Walter Hahn of the Congressional Research Service and Mr. Rene Zentner served as respondents to the presentation.

Mr. Speaker, I commend to all of my colleagues in both Houses of Congress the full text of the presentation.

CRITICAL ISSUES FACING AMERICA

Thank you very much. I am pleased and honored to be here. Driving over this morning, Ms. Ellision explained some of the work of the Congressional Institute For The Future and the need for Congress to think about and plan for the future. I was reflecting on the early days of the futurist method and how much it relied on a "black box" (i.e., on mysterious methods that could not be made clear to the layperson) and on predictions that could be confidently presented only because they concerned the 21st century when few of us would be around to check them.

Gradually, however, we are abandoning the black box and flat predictions for the sake of an approach that is more commonsensical and, I believe, more reliable. It is, first to identify one's assumptions about the kinds of changes that are projected for the future, and second, to correct these assumptions as the changed occur. It isn't as mysterious or as glamorous, but it is a disciplined way of thinking about the future.

Within this framework, let me make explicit some assumptions about four changes that we believe will make the American public psychology in the 1980's different from what it was in the 1960's and 1970's. My book, "New Rules," is written about one of these changes, but all four together provide a framework for thinking about the 1980's.

GROWING OLDER

The first change is the aging of the population. We are growing older: a fact that everyone knows but not everyone has thought about. In the 1930's for example, the dependency ratio—the number of people in the workforce who support those over 65 who are not working—was 9 to 1. Now it is 3 to 1. By 1990 it will be 2 to 1. This one fact is so overwhelming in terms of the burden it places on our society and on the relation between the generations (the young who work and the old who do not) that it is difficult to exaggerate.

Demography is always important, and this aspect of demography (the aging of our population) seems to me one of those decisive factors that has to be taken into account in making any assumptions about the future.

GROWING VULNERABILITY

A second set of factors, also obvious, are the changes in the economic environment and their effect on people—leaving Americans with a tremendous sense of vulnerability. Those of you in the Congress have a better feeling for this vulnerability than we do.

As our country's incredible thirty-year economic boom, stretching from the mid-1940's to the mid-1970's, begins to recede, it appears in retrospect as perhaps a unique period in world history. Certainly, it was the greatest economic boom the world has ever known, the greatest period of growth. And of course, we in the United States were the world's pace-setters.

By the end of the 1970's Americans began to experience an actual decline in their standard of living. This economic vulnerability was reinforced by a sense of vulnerability in foreign affairs. The public was stunned by what was happening on the foreign front, especially the taking of the hostages in Iran and our seeming inability to do anything about it. When we did try to do something active, our helicopters broke down and we encountered disaster in the desert. The Soviet incursion into Afghanistan was interpreted by President Carter as the most serious threat to peace since World War II. The press and many knowledgeable people in the foreign policy field derided Mr. Carter's statement, but the public accepted it at face value. It was one of those decisive interpretations of events that greatly influence public opinion. Afterwards, our surveys detected a pick-up in interest in strengthening our defenses and antagonism toward the Soviet Union that had been partly suppressed in the interest of detente. It was after Afghanistan and Mr. Carter's statement that the latent antagonism came to the surface. Such events, including the presence of Cuban troops in Africa and other things happening to us in the foreign field, were experienced by Americans as humiliations. It was felt that we were being pushed around, thwarted, frustrated.

When we examine the reaction of the public to these experiences we find strong evidence of pessimism and concern. For example, 72 percent of the public now believe that "this land of plenty is becoming a land of want." Surely this is an over-reaction, but it is an understandable reaction to events. In the surveys my firm, Yankelovich, Skelly and White, conducts, we often ask the public to imagine what their life will be like ten years from now. However troubled people may be at the moment, when they think about the ten-year future they usually are more sanguine and optimistic. That continues to be true, but now a majority of Americans state that ten years from now they don't think they will be able to buy a new home or to own a home of their own. This change is an important one.

NO INTERPRETATIVE FRAMEWORK

These considerations lead to a third factor. When people experience a setback that is the opposite of their expectations they have an almost desperate need to understand why it is happening, especially why it is happening to them. This need for some kind of an explanatory framework is something all of you in Congress understand very well. But one facet of it that is not well understood is that no one warned the American public that this change was coming. It is very difficult for people in positions of leadership to understand the full shock of the surprise. Most of you have attended countless conferences and seminars and committee meetings in recent years where you learned about the energy crisis, the increasing competitiveness of other nations, the changing rules of the economic front, etc. You made your own adjustments and calculations, so that this recent spate of negative news has been interpreted by you within a framework based on some understanding and some knowledge. But for the average American the bad news came like a bolt out of the blue. Americans were totally unprepared for any reversal in our national fortunes.

The psychology of the American majority up to just a few years ago was a feeling that it was time to relax and enjoy, to enjoy the fruits of affluence. When the setback came, not only didn't people understand what was happening and why, they were utterly unprepared psychologically for the change and they weren't given any credible explanation of what it all meant. The result is that today people are reacting badly: they've been thrown of balance, and are disoriented.

We are living through a change that many observers have characterized as a shift to the right. I see it less as an ideological shift than an emotional one. Let me explain what I mean. There is some evidence from surveys of a growth in conservatiive attitudes, but there is much confusion and contradiction in the evidence. I interpret the surveys as showing that the public is suffering from temporary disequilibrium by virtue of being thrown off balance. In seeking to regain their sense of control, some new attitudes are conservative; others are not. This is quite a different matter than an enduring swing to the right. Americans are confronted with a novel situation that no one has explained and they are filling in that void with whatever explanation lies at hand. Now, the most popular explanatory framework that people have embraced is "get government off our backs." Swollen government bureaucracies and budgets explain some of our problems and contain some element of truth. But any single explanation is limited. What happens when you blame government and things don't improve? I believe that in the 1980's we will see much wild experimentation with explanatory frameworks, of which blame-the-government is only the first. It's going to be a very confusing period; politically, it will be wide open to political leaders who meet people's need for a credible explanation of what is happening, why it is happening and what we should do about it.

SOCIAL MORALITY

A fourth factor, the theme of my book, "New Rules," is the search for a viable social morality. In the 1950's and 1960's most Americans belonged in one of two categories of people—people who put their family first and people who put their work first. Those were familiar types, hardly worth mentioning. The only time the categorization became noticeable was when suddenly in the late 1960's there began to emerge a third type of person—people who put their own self-fulfillment ahead of family or work. The new values of self-fulfillment were rooted in affluence, in the feeling that there was enough material well-being to permit us to enjoy and consume the products of our rich economy. We became a consuming society in that period.

For years most Americans simply assumed that the problems of supply were solved. Therefore, all one had to worry about was how to distribute the goodies. In the latest edition of his classic book, "The Lonely Crowd," David Riesman criticized himself and people like Kenneth Galbraith for having emphasized post-industrial attitudes prematurely. We were lulled into believing that we could afford to neglect the problems of keeping the economy vital. Many Americans assumed that we had enough affluence so that the problem, say, of making a living was "a piece of cake"—you lost your job, so what, get another one. This attitude became prevalent in the 1960's and 1970's, rooted in the conviction that there was no need to make the kinds of sacrifice one's parents had to make. It wasn't so much that people were unwilling to make the sacrifices as a feeling that there's no need for sacrifice. Why not live a little? Let us shake ourselves free of attitudes rooted in the past. We can have more of everything, and in fact we're entitled to more of everything.

There is an important point to be made about this set of values. Not only is it based on affluence, but it also reflects a deeply felt rebellion against an older ethic. And since that rebellion was led in the 1960's by college youth, that is by adolescents, from the outset the rebellion has had an adolescent character. It is in the nature of an adolescent rebellion that it must be negativistic and extreme. So, throughout the 1970's we were experimenting with new values defined essentially in opposition to our traditional morality.

These new values were not confined to young people or to a small counter-culture. They may have started that way in the 1960's but in our annual studies of changing cultural values throughout the 1970's we found that 80 percent of the American population were experimenting with these new values.

In the process of experimentation, millions of Americans discovered that many aspects of the new social morality did not work for them. For one thing, many failed with respect to their economic premises. To the extent that the new values presuppose that everybody's standard of living will increase annually in a steady upward trend, to the extent, that is that the problem of the economy is presumed to be solved, to that extent the new values are clearly inappropriate to the new economic climate in which we live today. People also found that some of the new values do not work for them in their personal lives. Through the inner journey they were seeking a life that would be broader and more spiritually enriching than their present life. In pursuing the new values people expected to find greater intimacy in their personal lives, but all too often found instead loneliness and isolation. They sought greater elbow room for their lives, but instead found themselves living narrower lives. They were searching for freedom from commitments, but they found rootlessness, depression and emptiness.

The bright side of this story is that in taking these risks with their lives people learned valuable lessons from their experience. This willingness to take chances distinguishes us from many Europeans who are afraid of risk. Experimenting, taking risks, learning, making adjustments—this is a healthy, and very American process. We are going through a period that is in many respects fertile and creative as people learn from their mistakes, and learn how to find a balance between old values and new ones.

We have challenged the values of traditional duty, sacrifice for others and self-denial, experimenting instead with a new ethic based on duty-to-self. That new ethic simply isn't working. So small wonder that those Americans today who are sure of their moral certainties have seized the initiative, but the vast majority of Americans, particularly the younger, well-educated majority, find themselves in a state of confusion and funk about their own moral certainties as they sort out which parts of the old morality and which parts of the new one makes sense.

In which direction are we now moving? I believe the present disequilibrium is momentary. We find ourselves plunged into a period of confusion because the objective changes in the world are enormous and the changes in our social values and morality are also enormous. But with time people do adjust and adapt, and that is happening now. With good leadership—and this, of course, is essential—we will recover our equilibrium and sense of control. The present disequilibrium is fertile ground for demagogues. I am heartened at the absence of scapegoating and demagogery in this climate. One might easily expect more; it is a measure of America's maturity that there is so little. Political leaders have an excellent opportunity to give people a credible explanation of the changes and the reasons for them in order to accelerate this process of constructive adaptation.

Secondly, I don't believe we are going to go back to yesterday. The changes are too great, they're too deep-rooted.

Americans no longer feel, as 80 percent did a generation ago, that it is wrong for a wife to work if her husband can support her. Today a majority of Americans (about 57 percent) want to have the option of continued work involvement rather than total retirement. Much of our legislation is based on the values of the last century, but there are new values in the land and they are going to effect changes in our legislation and social morality.

Finally, I would like to speculate briefly on what the new social morality might be like. If in the 1980's we're going through a process of rediscovering some old values and blending them with new ones, what will the new synthesis be?

Let me mention first some of the values we are reclaiming. We are rediscovering the future. Our preoccupation with living in the present is beginning to recede, and people are starting once again to express concern with the future. The Clearinghouse is a measure of that rediscovery.

We are rediscovering quality and excellence and skills. Partly this rediscovery reflects taking a longer range point of view; if you're worried about tomorrow you become interested in quality. Partly the rediscovery of skills comes from the tightening competitive situation in the world economy. We need skills to survive.

We are also rediscovering a faith in technology; the passion for nature and the natural is receding somewhat, with a growing conviction that new technology, whether in micro-processing or genetic engineering, will help us out of our present slump.

We are rediscovering a firm dedication to moral and religious values. Americans suspect that crime and violence, our economic troubles and even our military weakness have their roots in a flabby social morality. This is a very traditional American perspective that Americans are coming back to.

What, then, is new? If these are some of the older values that are now re-emerging, what are the new values that will combine with them? One is an intense desire to retain freedom of choice in one's lifestyle. Seventy-three percent of Americans say that greater choice is what differentiates their own lives from their parents' lives. Women, for example, want to be free to choose to be a housewife, to choose the traditional role without stigma. But they also want the freedom to choose work and career as an alternative.

Throughout the country various communities and cities are becoming more aware of themselves as communities, more determined to solve their own problems. There is a real hunger in people to reach beyond the self—to become part of the larger community. I see in people's outlook a readiness to take a more cooperative stance, for example, changing attitudes in unions and among management, shifting away from the familiar adversarial posture to a new cooperativeness.

These changes in social morality are more fundamental than the political categories of left and right. It would be wise for us to put aside these categories because they do not lead to useful predictions about the future. If you were to make inferences about the future based on the so-called swing to the right, the chances are that many of them would be wrong. Consider, for example, the public's desire to increase the military budget. This sentiment has been growing spectacularly in the country for a decade, rising from 11 percent to more than 70 percent. This is one of the steepest rises ever, reflecting the change from the post-Vietnam outlook to the post-Afghanistan outlook. From the point of view of a swing to the right one would assume that this desire is strong and firm. But just in the last few weeks the polls show a rise in the public's desire to cut that budget rather than social programs. One would not anticipate such softness if one were thinking in terms of a swing to the right, because those who hold a firm conservative view feel strongly that the military budget should have top priority, come what may. I could point to many similar instances where inferences based on the swing to the right theory would lead to false predictions. A sounder basis for inference is to assume that the present mood reflects the struggle of Americans to regain their equilibrium and to find a new social morality.●

AID FOR DISABLED IS DEFENDED

HON. AUSTIN J. MURPHY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, with the passage of Public Law 94-142, the Education for All Handicapped Children Act, in 1975 the Congress issued a strong bipartisan message to the Nation's citizens—that each handicapped child has a right to a free appropriate public education and that the Federal Government would assist States in providing such an education. However, only 1 month after the International Year of Disabled Persons, 1981, which proclaimed worldwide recognition for the needs of the disabled this opportunity is being seriously challenged by the Department of Education's proposal to repeal the act through the imposition of block grants and to reduce the funding for this program substantially below current levels.

It is widely recognized that in your State as well as mine, any major alteration of Public Law 94-142 will mean that many handicapped children may be denied their right to appropriate education programs. We must keep in mind that this statute, even with its short history, is working successfully to bring Federal and State education officials together with teachers and school administrators across the country to provide a free appropriate public education to nearly 4 million handicapped youth.

In this regard, I would like to enter into the RECORD an article that appeared in the January 10, 1982, issue of the New York Times. It was written by Edwin W. Martin, who served in the Federal Government's program for the handicapped from 1969 to 1981 and was the Department of Education's first Assistant Secretary for Special Education and Rehabilitative Services. I hope that my colleagues will give this issue the serious attention I believe it merits.

[From the New York Times, Jan. 10, 1982]

WINTER SURVEY OF EDUCATION AID FOR DISABLED IS DEFENDED

(By Edwin W. Martin)

A wise old farmer in Alabama listened to my plans many years ago and summed up his views with the folk saying, "If it ain't broke, don't fix it."

The Education of the Handicapped Act, which finally assures handicapped children a free and appropriate public education, is working. As we pass the third anniversary of the full implementation of this law, 4.2 million children—blind, deaf, mentally, physically or emotionally disabled, speech- or language-impaired or with specific learning disabilities—are enrolled in special-education programs. Despite remarkable progress in the educating of the handicapped children of our nation, the Reagan Administration want to "fix" this problem by returning national public policy to what it was before 1965. Congress, recalling all too well the pain and anger of parents of disabled children who are denied schooling, has refused to go along with the Administration, but the Administration threatens to keep trying.

We have been a long time in wiping out discrimination and rejection of the handicapped. In 1965, when Congress passed the Johnson Administration's major educational programs—authorizing billions of dollars for disadvantaged elementary and secondary school children, there was no provision for handicapped children. In public-policy terms, this group of educationally disadvantaged was out of sight and out of mind. The next year, at the urging of concerned parents, a small program was approved, authorizing grants to the states to initiate, improve and expand local and state efforts. Only $2.5 million was appropriated in 1967 and its growth was relatively minimal, to $14.25 million, in 1968.

I remember well the pleas of parents before the House subcommittee on the handicapped. They told tales of being totally ignored, of being left out by the public schools in their communities. They spoke of having to move their families to distant cities and states to get help. They told of being offered $1,000 or $1,500 by school districts in lieu of accepting the children and of discovering that private schools demanded three or four times as much. Even where there were programs, these children were frequently given second-class treatment.

It was not that there were no role-models, indeed there were fine programs. Many communities had operated special-education programs for decades. The painful fact was that there was no guarantee of a program. The decision was left entirely to the local and state authorities, and the record demonstrated (without disagreement from state officials), that no state fully served its disabled children.

The need for a national law was inescapably demonstrated by our history. When each state went its own way, virtually every one passed a law encouraging school districts to educate the disabled. Most of these laws provided additional funds to assist local districts. Unfortunately, these laws did not succeed and parents spoke up, asking for stronger laws. As a result, many states passed a second generation of legislation, the so-called mandatory laws, which required local districts to educate children and also provided additional funds.

These laws were not fully enforced, had various "exclusions" and, in sum, failed to succeed in educating all handicapped children in even one state.

In desperation, parents turned to Congress and the courts. Congress passed laws in the 1960's and early 70's to spur local interest, but not to require programs. Federal and state judges, however, decided in a variety of cases that states, having agreed to educate their children, could not discriminate against any subgroup of them.

In 1975, after a decade of experimenting with various approaches and almost four years of considering the specific legislation in question, Congress passed the Education of All Handicapped Children Act (P.L. 94-142). It did not require the states to participate (New Mexico has never even submitted a plan), but it did say that states wishing to receive Federal funds to help comply with their own responsibilities, had to assure education for the handicapped.

As a result of court orders and Congressional action, millions of children received new opportunities in the 1970's. Federal studies disclosed many problems in achieving desired results. One study by the Inspector General's office of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare reported that a majority of teachers and officials felt there were still unserved children, unidentified in the classrooms, several years later. At the same time, a variety of studies reported progress in every district studied—new teachers, new programs, new children!

This progress continues today. The most recent Department of Education statistics report a gain of more than 100,000 in children helped last year.

Discrimination against the disabled is insidious. One does not find "handicapped bigots," but the bias has persisted across centuries and cultures. In providing education, employment and access to buildings, the United States has come a long way. But we have not yet arrived. If one assumes that this history of discrimination is not an accident, that there are forces within us, perhaps unconscious fears of death and disability, that keep us from fully including disabled people in our society, there is no reason to weaken our national resolve, nor to ignore the lessons we so recently have learned.

We now play a leadership role in the world. I recently returned from Britain where, at the request of several members of the House of Lords, I reported on the successes and failures of our new law. That Government is planning legislation to assure educational opportunity for all "special needs" children, a group estimated to include 1 child in 5, rather than the 10 to 12 percent that we expect to serve.

With our Government planning to spend a sum labeled in "trillions" for defense over the next decade, it is hard to understand arguments against spending a 1,000th as much annually to help the handicapped, particularly since it has been repeatedly proved that such expenditures reduce dependency and increase employment. As we still face great variations among communities and states in the number of handicapped children they are helping—some reaching almost twice as many as others in percentage terms—it is hard to understand a philosophy of "let the states do it."

One afternoon in 1977 I sat with Peter Libassi, then Health, Education and Welfare's general counsel, listening to witnesses while we were considering pending regulations for Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act, the section prohibiting discrimination against qualified disabled people. Among the witnesses was the mother of a disabled child from a nearby state.

She told of her retarded daughter standing in the living room looking out the window as the school bus drove up their road, stopping to pick up other children. As the mother told us of her daughter asking each day why she could not go to school, the mother began to cry. So did the general council, so did I and, I believe, so did everyone else in that room. I have no wish to play that scene again, nor do the parents of handicapped American children.●

BISHOP LESLIE DeLAPP

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, recently, my district lost one of its leading citizens with the death of Bishop Leslie DeLapp. For many years Jackson County, Mo., benefited from the presence of this man and his endeavors in behalf of his church and his community.

An editorial in the Kansas City Times speaks to the efforts of Bishop DeLapp and the effect he had on the community. It reads as follows:

In the postwar years, few civic leaders in Metropolitan Kansas City attained the stature and high level of achievement of Bishop G. Leslie DeLapp, now dead at 86. The bishop was never just a well-known name on a letterhead. If he accepted an assignment, and many of them came his way over the decades, he was prepared to make a full commitment. And that included spadework on subcommittees and the handling of everyday details as well as the presidency and chairmanship of major boards and agencies. His presence at meetings, no matter how trivial they were, could be taken for granted. Those who knew him well were always puzzled how he found the time.

His long service to the Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, as presiding bishop from 1940 to 1966 and in many other capacities, would have kept most individuals fully occupied. But the good man found time for many other activities and it was through his community work that he became widely known.

His contributions spanned the fields of health and welfare, regional cooperation, good government and the volunteer agencies. In the middle 1950s when the very words "regional planning" sent shivers through many circles, Bishop DeLapp not only recognized the wisdom of working together, but he willingly represented Jackson County as the vice-president at the inception of the Metropolitan Area Planning Council. His interest in joint action to solve common problems was also reflected in his service to the Kansas City Area Hospital Association of which he was a founding member and first president.

Bishop DeLapp was a strong and effective member of the board of the old General Hospital and Medical Center Inc. in the troubled and uncertain transition years that led to the Truman Medical Center on Hospital Hill. The Jackson County Charter Commission and the Jackson County Sports Authority, which he chaired in the middle 1970s, are other examples that reflect the broad scope of his activities.

To all of those assignments, and many more, Bishop DeLapp brought a sense of dignity and integrity that inspired public trust. He was a calm, reasoned, constructive person. He studied problems carefully, weighing them against his judgment and long experience as an administrator. Because he approached problems with common sense and compassion, he was often the originator of workable compromises that would bring opposing parties together.

Many who served with him grew to regard him as one of the finest individuals they had known. In the case of Bishop G. Leslie DeLapp that respect was given freely to an extraordinary man who served his church and his community with distinction for more than a generation.●

STATE ENERGY SEVERANCE TAXES COULD LEAD TO A DOMESTIC ENERGY CARTEL

HON. TOM CORCORAN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. CORCORAN. Mr. Speaker, I am concerned that severance taxes by energy-rich States on energy resources within those States may be leading to the establishment of a domestic energy cartel. As a legislative expression of my concern, I introduced H.R. 4841, the Coal Severance Tax Limitation Act of 1981 on October 27, 1981. That legislation would amend the Powerplant and Industrial Fuel Use Act of 1978 by placing a ceiling on severance taxes a State can impose on coal produced from Federal and Indian lands. The bill was referred to the Energy and Commerce Committee's Subcommittee on Fossil and Synthetic Fuels, of which I am a member. A full day hearing on this issue was held by that subcommittee on October 28, 1981.

At the time I introduced H.R. 4841, I stated that severance taxes by "have" States at the expense of "have not" States seem to create an inequity that I believe Congress must address. The same concerns were expressed by Vanderbilt University professor James F. Blumstein in a January 7, 1982, Wall Street Journal article entitled, "Opening the Way to a Domestic Energy Cartel."

Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of our colleagues, I insert the text of Professor Blumstein's article on the important issue of State energy severance taxation.

OPENING THE WAY TO A DOMESTIC ENERGY CARTEL

(By James F. Blumstein)

There is evidence of growing protectionism among the states. For example, several states bar the export of water. Texas limits the export of natural gas from state-owned lands if the needs of Texas consumers are unfilled. And New Hampshire prohibits the export of hydroelectric power.

A very few Western states control a large percentage of environmentally desirable low-sulphur coal. Montana and Wyoming together have an estimated 68 percent of all U.S. low-sulphur reserves.

A certain "tax leadership" apparently is occurring among such states so that legislatures, freed of competitive pressures, feel secure in raising severance tax rates on coal's extraction. The obvious next step might be an informal cartel among low-sulphur-coal-producing states. Over time a broader domestic energy cartel could emerge. Under recent Supreme Court precedents, our constitutional system might permit such a development.

Congress is authorized under the Constitution to regulate commerce among the states. For well over a century, the Supreme Court has ruled that, even in the absence of affirmative congressional action, state laws that unduly burden or discriminate against interstate commerce violate the "dormant" commerce clause.

The court has preserved the national marketplace against balkanization. However, its "dormant" commerce clause decisions are subject to reversal by Congress, which can, in effect, overturn such rulings by authorizing the states' conduct. Thus, when interstate commerce is excessively burdened or discriminated against, the court upsets state legislation only temporarily if the state whose law is invalidated can make its case persuasively before the Congress.

The court's strictest review has been reserved for state taxation or regulation that does not treat in-state and out-of-state commercial interests evenhandedly. These measures have been held virtually per se illegal.

As early as 1911, the court ruled invalid a state's legislative preference for in-state consumers of privately produced natural gas. When New Jersey banned the importation of solid waste to privately owned landfills, the court in 1978 held the legislation unconstitutional. Similarly, Louisiana's "first-use" tax on natural gas, whose incidence fell on out-of-state but not in-state users, was declared invalid last year. The court's tough stand against discrimination thrusts on states the onus of justifying protectionist legislation to Congress.

One might comfortably conclude that a state-enacted embargo would run afoul of this nondiscrimination principle. Last year's South Dakota cement case, however, suggests an important exception. Where the state enters the market as a seller of state-produced goods, these commerce clause precedents were found inapplicable. They govern only when a tax or a regulation is involved.

Thus, because South Dakota was selling cement produced from a state-owned plant, it was free to refuse to sell to nonresidents. Had the state, through regulation, imposed an embargo on private sellers, however, that would have violated the nondiscrimination principle.

The South Dakota case is important because states own so many natural resources and presumably can develop them through governmental entities, circumventing the commerce clause's nondiscrimination principle. Although the court suggested that natural resource exploitation might present a different situation, the opinion provided no analytically satisfying basis for distinguishing the cases.

A state's ability to prefer its own citizens in the exploitation of state-owned resources provides a vehicle for attracting new industry and for assisting state industries that compete with industries elsewhere. Unlike private companies, which have no incentive to make economic decisions on the basis of any particular state's economic welfare, a state-owned enterprise would certainly consider the external benefits (such as taxes that flow from expanded economic opportunity within a state.

As a result, state enterprises will operate in a political as well as an economic market, and the political constituency to which the state is responsive is necessarily its own residents. Negative consequences of protectionist policies on other states can, therefore, safely be given less weight.

Ironically, the South Dakota cement decision provides a prescription for protectionism that encourages the development of state enterprises, a statist strategy quite at odds with the general capitalist reawakening occuring elsewhere in our society.

While the South Dakota cement case provides a basis for states to prefer their own citizens in the exploitation of state-owned resources, a recent case upholding Montana's 30% severance tax on coal suggests a means of imposing much of the burden for generating revenue on nonresident utility ratepayers. Out-of-state utilities purchase most of Montana's coal by long-term contracts, which typically provide that the cost of state taxation shall be passed on to the utilities. Fuel adjustment clauses allow these utilities to pass along the taxes to out-of-state consumers.

In the Montana decision, the court refused to examine the state's rate of taxation, nor would it consider the potential impact on interstate commerce. Moreover, since state action is largely immune from the antitrust laws, any conspiracy-in-restraint-of-trade theory would likely be inapplicable to collusive state activity aimed at maintaining high severance taxes.

Congress could limit severance tax rates, and such bills have been introduced. It could also bar discrimination in the sale of state-owned resources. But the burden of initiating such legislation rests with resource-consuming states, who must directly confront the fundamental economic interests of the resource-rich states, a divisive and likely futile prospect.

Commerce clause restrictions on discriminatory or unduly burdensome state legislation are designed to impose the burden of enacting national legislation on proponents of protectionism, on the theory that free trade is the presumptive constitutional norm. By declining even to examine the burden on interstate commerce of Montana's coal severance tax and by immunizing South Dakota's cement embargo entirely from the otherwise applicable principle of nondiscrimination against interstate commerce, the Montana and South Dakota cases sanction two methods of parochial resource exploitation.

In the absence of congressional legislation, the way toward a domestic energy cartel seems open. The balkanization of the American economy and the emergence of intersectional economic retaliation are potential consequences.●

WHY WE WON'T RUN OUT OF RESOURCES

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, for decades excitable and misinformed "Cock Robins" have been telling us that the "sky is falling in" and that we are running out of this or that resource. Geography books in the 1930's routinely stated that we only had a 10-year supply of oil left. Mr. M. Stanton Evans recently explained in Human Events of November 21, 1981, how the "gloom and doom" prophets have been setting up these disaster straw men over the years and how they have nearly always been wrong. The item follows:

WHY WE WON'T RUN OUT OF RESOURCES

(By M. Stanton Evans)

[Graphs not printed in the RECORD]

Back in the 1970s, it will be recalled, the American people got scared out of their wits by the horrific specter of environmental doomsday.

According to the rhetoric of the era, we faced a knot of terrible problems created by massive population growth and careless use of our resources. We were running out of energy, arable land, and needed minerals, creating ghastly pollution dangers and raising the prospect of global fame. Only drastic measures could avert disaster.

So steadily was this outlook pounded home by environmentalists, population planners, government spokesmen and media sages that it became the accepted wisdom of the day, and the basis for numerous official policies. All of which is most unfortunate, since the hysteria about such matters was—and is—without foundation in economic science.

That the "no growth" movement was little more than quackery is the burden of a luminous new study by Prof. Julian Simon of the University of Illinois, who began as a population pessimist but was redeemed by contact with the evidence. In The Ultimate Resource (Princeton; $14.50), Simon shows beyond all peradventure that the furor over population, environment and resource depletion is totally—and in some case, willfully—mistaken.

The central fallacy of the no-growthers, Simon demonstrates, is that they envision the usable resources of the earth—minerals, farm land, energy supplies—as a fixed and given quantity, over against a rapidly growing population. This way of viewing the matter inevitably leads to the conclusion that we will run out of everything in fairly short order.

The way it happens in the real world, however, is different. The amount of usable resources is not and never has been a given quantity known beforehand; it is a function of human ingenuity and effort. Coal, petroleum, copper, etc., are useful now because somebody figured out a way to use them. The same will be true of countless other resources in the future, if we permit the creative powers of the human mind—the ultimate resource of the title—to do their work.

Equally to the point, as Simon shows, the available quantity of resources already known is also a function of human effort. Despite a century of repeated statements that we are about to run out of coal, arable land, or some other resources, known supplies of all these things have constantly expanded—in keeping with increased demand and the improved return to be had by finding and developing them.

As a result, Simon observes, the global "per capita food situation has been improving for the three decades since World War II. . . . The amount of agricultural land has been, and still is, increasing substantially. . . . If the past is any guide, natural resources will progressively become less scarce, and less costly. . . . The long-run impact of additional people is likely to speed the development of a cheap energy supply that is almost inexhaustible."

To support his point, Simon reproduces numerous charts and tables from the United Nations and other official sources revealing a constantly rising standard of living, improvements in farm yields, dramatic increases in mineral supplies, declining levels of pollution, constantly falling energy prices. He also shows that "population bomb" anxieties are baseless, that high population densities don't mean poverty, and that population figures won't extrapolate themselves into infinity.

Exceptions to the process of resource growth do occur, of course—when government policies keep it from working. In the case of oil and natural gas, for example, federal price controls and other types of government interference encourage consumption while discouraging production—an infallible formula for shortage. When such restrictions are absent, the process goes on in noble fashion.

Policies that hinder expansion are of course encouraged, if not demanded outright, by the "no growth" campaign—promoting a lifeboat-conservation ethic, ignoring production, and heaping burdensome regulations on the economy Prof. Simon supplies a valuable antidote to that destructive dose of self-fulfilling prophecy.●

JEWISH HUMANITARIAN NEEDS

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House of Representatives to the ambitious campaign about to be embarked upon by Jewish Federation Council of Greater Los Angeles in support of a full spectrum of Jewish humanitarian needs. Drastic cutbacks in Federal subsidies for JFC social welfare agencies have severely threatened the continuity of programs and services offered for young and old, Jewish and non-Jewish alike by these unique organizations. These spending deficits will have to be met by the Jewish community in addition to its own share of the burden of responsibility inflated by current economic conditions.

I would like to commend Bernardo Kracer, 1982 general chairman of the United Jewish Welfare Fund, and Los Angeles' Jewish leadership for creating a strong vehicle which will offer maximum community involvement in pursuit of its own goals. I speak in particular of the UJWF Super Sunday kickoff phoneathon campaign on February 7, 1982. On that day well over 1,000 volunteers—including for the first time deaf and developmentally disabled Jewish community members will join together to raise $1.5 million.

This event—involving the largest number of Jewish community volunteers to be assembled under one roof—will set the pace for the year long UJWF 1982 campaign focused on a $44 million goal. Let us wish this fine community much success in its important work.●

PEPPER'S AGELESS ZEST FOR LIFE

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, in the face of the administration's assault on programs that help our elderly live decent lives, our distinguished colleague from Florida has won deserved acclaim for his passionate and principled defense of senior citizens' rights. His remarkable achievements and even more remarkable spirit continue to serve as an inspiration to all, and I commend to my colleagues this fine article on Congressman CLAUDE PEPPER by Colman McCarthy of the Washington Post.

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 3, 1982]

PEPPER'S AGELESS ZEST FOR LIFE

(By Colman McCarthy)

Whatever your taste in politics or poetry, this was a charming moment. Rep. Claude Pepper, the 81-year-old congressman from Florida, was speaking over the phone with 89-year-old friend Archibald MacLeish. "I hope you're enjoying life," said Pepper, who placed the call from his House office to MacLeish in the poet's home in Massachusetts. "Other than your little hearing impairment, I hope your physical condition is good. You've got eight years on me! I'm only 81. You give me something to shoot at!"

Pepper laughed jovially. He chatted for 10 minutes with MacLeish. The congressman had phoned America's greatest living poet for his advice about a joint session of Congress late in January to observe the centennial of the birth of Franklin D. Roosevelt. MacLeish suggested some appropriate FDR readings, which was why Pepper had phoned.

A few days earlier, Pepper was in the national eye at the White House Conference on Aging. In the weeks before, his office had received 130 requests for interviews. For a little while, that may have made the Miami Democrat the most sought after member of Congress. But on a higher level it was a coalescence of interest in one of American politics' unique figures.

As chairman of the House Select Committee on Aging, Pepper has maintained a mountain-high vision of what government should be doing to better serve its elderly. With more than 4,000 citizens turning 65 every day, and 25 million already there, Pepper represents this national constituency as a pugnacious but reasonable advocate.

This was the committee that the House never even wanted to let in the front door. It began in the early 1970s when Sen. David Pryor (D-Ark.), then a representative, rented a trailer and held unofficial hearings. Pryor had worked incognito in a nursing home where he witnessed the shabby treatment given to the elderly.

When Pepper took over the committee, he was familiar too—in personal ways—with the abuses visited upon the old. Nearly every issue involving the elderly to come before Congress—from restrictive mandatory retirement laws to malnutrition among the old—has engaged Pepper. Behind his legislative zeal is a philospohical attachment to Shaw's notion about the old: "Some are younger at 70 than most at 17."

The hour and a half I had with Pepper the other morning was to enjoy an uplifting mixture of history lessons, political nuances and ideals of public service. Pepper gives personality to a style of hearty liberalism now out of fashion, at least temporarily.

The abandonment of liberalism by some of the younger politicians in Congress springs from two causes, he believes. First, they came to Washington not "deeply rooted in liberal convictions." And second, once here "they don't want to be identified as liberals because they think public opinion has turned away from the humanitarian influence in public affairs . . . They are fearful of their political lives, and they think that (liberalism) has come to have an unfavorable association."

Of the nine presidents Pepper has served under, he gives a low ranking to Ronald Reagan. With animation, he says that Reagan "comes the nearest to having the charm of President Roosevelt. But I would think that one would be unhappy to have it said that I'd hardly done anything that was meaningful in any affirmative way for the people of my country. Now he wants to cut more and more and more."

Pepper felt honored that Reagan mentioned him in his speech at the conference on aging. But, wistfully, he says he has never met the president. The night before our conversation, Pepper had been to the White House for "an official hosting" of the Congress. But Reagan went upstairs early and missed the chance to talk with Pepper, leaving the Senator to say: "I had rather looked forward to meeting the president."

Should Ronald Reagan's spirit ever sag in the year about to dawn, one sure pick-me-up would be a long visit with Claude Pepper.●

PROJECT PRIDE RECOGNIZES STUDENTS' ACHIEVEMENTS

HON. CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, one of our Nation's greatest assets is the pride of our people. Each year, millions of civic-minded citizens make valuable contributions to their communities. Unfortunately, these people do not always receive the kind of recognition they deserve.

In Lawrence Township, N.J., the Lawrence Township Board of Education has initiated a people-to-people program that emphasizes the significant contributions that have been made by members of the Lawrence Township public schools. This program has been named appropriately as "Project Pride." I am very pleased that the people of Lawrence Township have decided to honor individuals and organizations which bring a sense of pride, achievement, and unity to the school system and the entire community.

On January 30, 1982, the people of Lawrence Township will participate in "Project Pride II" ceremonies. The board of education has selected Scott Brunner, quarterback of the New York Giants, and a graduate of Lawrence High School, and the members of the championship Cardinal football teams of the graduating classes of 1974 and 1975 to be the recipients of special recognition this year.

Scott Brunner and the members of the 1974 and 1975 championship teams justly deserve this honor in recognition of their dedication, determination and desire to excel. The records that these championship teams compiled in 1974 (8-0-1) and 1975 (7-2) are testimony to their outstanding achievements.

These fine athletes are also well aware that athletic competition can have a very beneficial impact on an individual's scholastic performance and overall community involvement. Athletic activity strengthens the body and sharpens the will. By participating on school and community sports teams, individuals can also learn the value of teamwork and cooperation. These experiences should prove to be very valuable in whatever career path these students choose to pursue.

Mr. Speaker, the people of Lawrence Township are justifiably proud that Scott Brunner played such an instrumental role in leading the New York Giants to the National Football League playoffs during this past season. Scott's desire for excellence, which was nurtured in the Lawrence Township school system, has proven to be invaluable to him in his professional career.

It is indeed an honor for me to acknowledge the outstanding contributions that Scott Brunner and the members of the 1974 and 1975 championship Cardinal football teams have made to their community. I commend the Lawrence Township Board of Education for initiating "Project Pride." I hope that this program will inspire other students to seek to excel in their chosen field so that they, too, can contribute to a spirit of cooperation and unity in their community.●

COAL EXPORTS

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, on numerous occasions I have stood before this body to extoll the merits of increased coal exports, which creates more jobs in this country, contributes toward a favorable balance of trade and provides our allies with a measure of energy security.

Recent figures show that in 1981, the United States exported approximately 106 million tons of coal the value of which is estimated to be around $15 billion. In 1981, this level of coal export contributed about $4 billion toward reducing our balance-of-trade deficit and if this trend continues, by the year 2000 coal should add $14 billion toward a favorable balance of trade.

These exports not only created jobs in the mining and rail industries, but helped allied nations reduce their dependency on other energy sources. This is especially important in light of France's announcement last week that it would receive up to one-third of its natural gas supply from the Soviet Union, which already intends to supply natural gas to Western Germany.

Yet, we must still get our house in order. Increased exports have been hindered by the inability of many ports to handle large quantities of coal on an expedited basis due to antiquated loading facilities and permitting processes. Future exports will be jeopardized because domestic ports are unable to accommodate large "supercolliers" of over 100,000 deadweight tons which require deeper port channels. If the United States is to remain competitive on the world market, it must dredge these channels to at least 55 feet.

The immediate problem of port congestion has, to a great extent, been solved by the private sector as the following article explains. New coal port facilities are being constructed by the coal industry while the railroads have revised their method of scheduling ships waiting to be loaded. Now it is up to the Federal Government, working with the local port authorities, to expedite needed port improvements. With this in mind, it is my hope we can enact port improvement legislation this year.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Jan. 19, 1982]

RAILROADS CUT COAL BOTTLENECK BY IMPROVING SHIP SCHEDULING

(By Eugene Carlson)

One observer, standing on the beach near Norfolk, Va., and gazing north across Chesapeake Bay, said it looked like "a flotilla of sea monsters." Some 150 huge coal-carrying vessels lay at anchor in and around the harbor of Hampton Roads, waiting for a turn at one of the port's two coal-loading piers. One ship had swung idly at its moorings for more than five months before its name was called.

That was the scene last February. Now, eleven months later, the bottleneck at Hampton Roads, the nation's biggest coal-exporting port, has been broken. Colliers arrive, load coal, and steam away with little delay. Much of the credit for eliminating the vessel logjam goes, oddly enough, to two regional railroads: the Norfolk & Western and the Chessie System.

The railroads operate the port's coal docks. By figuring out ways to schedule ships more efficiently—much as popular restaurants require diners to make reservations—the railroads have helped smooth out the coal supply line that stretches from the mines of southern Appalachia to seaports to overseas consumers in Europe, Japan and elsewhere. Equally important, the new system has saved millions of dollars in demurrage—the penalty that ship owners collect when their vessels are prevented from picking up cargo at an appointed time.

"We fight with the railroads all the time, but they ought to be lauded for this," says Connie Holmes, vice president for international affairs of the National Coal Association.

The U.S. is the world's largest coal exporter. Shipments have been largely metallurgical coal for steel-plant furnaces. But with European utilities looking for alternatives to high-priced OPEC oil, demand for "steam coal" has risen sharply. Strikes in Poland's mines have enhanced the status of U.S. coal.

Shippers, however, require port facilities, and so the promotion of coal-loading terminals in port cities is a growth industry. Albany, N.Y.; Baltimore; Philadelphia; Moorhead City, N.C.; Charleston, S.C.; Savannah, Ga.; New Orleans; Long Beach, Calif., and Seward, Alaska, are among the ports with new, expanded or proposed coal piers.

Hampton Roads, which in 1980 handled 67 percent of all U.S. coal exports, has six new coal export sites planned. Hampton Roads includes the ports of Norfolk, Newport News and Portsmouth.

Since U.S. coal export capacity has roughly doubled in the past two years, to about 120 million tons annually from about 65 million tons at the beginning of 1980, the rush to build new piers sounds like overkill. "Frankly, a lot of these announcements aren't going to come about," says the National Coal Association's Mrs. Holmes. "You're not going to build a white elephant at 18 percent interest."

Significantly, the Chessie and the Norfolk & Western, the nation's two biggest coal-exporting railroads, are trying to move more coal by better ship scheduling rather than by expanding their Hampton Roads piers. The scheduling schemes became possible under the 1980 railroad deregulation act, which allows common carriers to make contracts with customers.

The two rail lines have different approaches. The Chessie's "away with permission" concept requires a vessel to call at Hampton Roads and reserve a future place in the queue for itself or a sister ship. Any vessel can sign up and the ship can sail elsewhere in the meantime.

The N&W guarantees "priority berthing" for big shippers—those who agree to take a minimum of 800,000 tons annually for two years. Allen B. Childress, the N&W's director of international coal and ore traffic, recalls earlier days when "we had 100-some vessels in Hampton Roads and we didn't load a pound of coal because of coordination difficulties." The new system "has definitely improved the efficiency of our piers," he says.●

CRISIS OF STUDENT AID IN COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES

HON. PAUL SIMON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. Speaker, the December 6, 1981, New York Times featured an article by Dr. Stephen Trachenberg on the plight of colleges and universities facing reductions in the number of their students receiving student grants and loans. Dr. Trachenberg is president of the University of Hartford and represents higher education administrators who are trying to cope with reductions in Federal student aid and who face even further restrictions and reductions in Federal programs under the proposed 1983 White House budget.

Dr. Trachenberg does not speak from the statistical and budget figures we in Washington produce, analyze, and point to in our discussions of postsecondary education programs. His concerns are for his university budget and the students who attend the Univeristy of Hartford. They are real people and they suffer real hardships with constricted Federal aid to students.

I commend my colleagues to read Dr. Trachenberg's article for its immediacy to one school, and its implications for all schools. I would like to emphasize my own agreement with Dr. Trachenberg when he says:

Education is mistakingly being perceived of by the Reagan Administration as a national expense. Nothing could be further from the truth. Properly seen, Federal and state programs in support of student aid are investments in America's young people and in ourselves.

I hope this will be the attitude of Congress during the upcoming budget process where we will have an opportunity to hold the line on aid, both grants and loans, to those students who represent our Nation's future.

REDUCING AID FOR STUDENTS SHORTCHANGES NATION'S FUTURE

(By Stephen Trachenberg)

Building an annual budget at the University of Hartford has never been easy, but this year it's a pip. The university is a modestly endowed, labor intensive, independent institution founded in 1877 but chartered as a university only 25 years ago, and a lot of fancy footwork and hard work is needed to keep its books in balance. But we've done so regularly for a long, long time. It's a tradition that we intend to maintain.

In the last four years our operating costs have gone from about $17 million to approximately $40 million. Each year a greater percentage of our students, who come from all sorts of economic, ethnic and racial backgrounds, have received a larger number of scholarship dollars from our limited resources and from those generated by Federal programs, state scholarships, private foundations, corporate philanthropy, alumni and other friends of the university.

In the current academic year, 82 percent of University of Hartford students are receiving some form of financial aid from one source or another for a total estimated at $11.2 million. The University of Hartford's contribution is $2,049,739. This compares with $793,032 spent in 1977.

As we prepare for the 1982-83, academic year, the university if facing a unique challenge. Student financial support programs, carefully developed out of G.I. Bill of Rights at the end of World War II, appear to be imperiled. Since the Reagan Administration took office in January, Federal student-aid programs have undergone three rounds of cuts. The recisions from the fiscal year 1981 budget were followed by reductions in program ceilings imposed by the Omnibus Reconciliation Act and then by Administration-proposed appropriations below the reconciliation levels. At first, excess was reduced and properly so. But the knife has now moved from fat to lean.

Cuts in the need-based student aid programs for the Government's fiscal year 1981 totaled $600 million. This affected college students and their families from coast to coast. Reduced spending ceilings for higher education programs for fiscal years 1982, 1983 and 1984 as well as appropriation limits on the Pell Grant Program and parallel efforts, such as ceilings imposed on financial aid, result in a loss of $1 billion from "current policy" funding levels, which would have permitted continued support for currently eligible students and modest growth to reflect inflation.

Eligibility for guaranteed student loans was restricted to students with family incomes of $30,000 a year or less, or unmet demonstrated need of $30,000, and a 5 percent origination fee was established for each new guaranteed loan. Moreover, the interest on loans to parents was increased from 9 percent to 14 percent.

The new eligiblity requirements will force an undetermined number of borrowers out of the program by next year. Experts estimate that the number affected could be one million students and possibly more.

Educational benefits in the Social Security program are to be phased out entirely by fiscal year 1985, with no new recipients as of June 1982 and current beneficiaries will experience an annual reduction of 25 percent. This step alone will eliminate one of the largest sources of student support.

Some 750,000 students now receive Social Security benefits totaling $2 billion annually, or one-fifth of the total Federal student aid. Since most Social Security beneficiaries are from families with extremely low incomes, the loss of these benefits will place severe strains on the other student-aid programs, which have also been reduced.

It should now be understood that the Reagan Administration proposes cuts on top of earlier cuts. The Administration's recommendations will have the following impact:

The neediest Pell Grant recipients would receive a maximum of only $1,670 and awards for others would have to be severly reduced or even eliminated. Since it costs over $1.6 billion annually to finance students with family incomes of less than $10,000 (over 1.5 million students), passage of the Administration's request of only $2.2 billion would leave an inadequate amount to aid those above the poverty level.

The number of Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grant recipients, a campus-based grant program, would be reduced by 75,000 students.

College Work Study recipients would be reduced by 110,000.

Fifty thousand fewer students would receive National Direct Student Loan awards.

Some 30,000 state scholarships would be ended by the elimination of the $9 million in State Student Incentive Grants.

Another Administration recommendation would remove the school interest subsidy from the Guaranteed Student Loan Program. This would endanger future lending if banks are forced to bill students while in school.

The Administration's recommendations represent a 30 percent cut in the "current services" level, a 16 percent cut in the Reconciliation Act levels, a 6 percent cut in the fiscal year 1981 levels and an 11 percent cut in the fiscal 1980 levels (despite a 20 percent increase in the Consumer Price Index). It's impossible at this time to determine the exact dollar effect, for the University of Hartford, for other universities or for the individual students and their families, since Congress has not yet taken final action on the President's proposals.

At the University of Hartford we will give scrupulous attention to each request for financial assistance. Plans are under way to insure that each student receives the maximum outside assistance for which he or she is eligible. Additionally, we will see to it that an equitable part of the university's resources go to our students. Finding additional money for scholarships from within our own operating budget is of top priority. With luck and industry we hope to be able to enhance student aid in a way unprecedented in the history of the University of Hartford.

We expect to encourage and assist students and their parents in exploring their eligibility for scholarship resources through employers, fraternal organizations, unions and similar groups. Further, we plan to underscore our "family-grant" program by which a full-time undergraduate day student who is the brother, sister, parent or spouse of another full-time undergraduate day student at the university may be eligible for a 50 percent reduction in tuition. Thus, two students can come for the price of one and a half. Triplets may attend for the tuition of twins. Also, student employment opportunities will be enhanced, both during the academic year and during vacation periods.

Institutions of higher education with modest means, such as ours, have limited capacities to respond to drastic reductions in Government aid. Ingenuity and prudence will be required to squeeze every penny on behalf of our students while continuing to deliver high quality educational programs.

Education is mistakingly being perceived of by the Reagan Administration as a national expense. Nothing could be further from the truth. Properly seen, Federal and state programs in support of student aid are investments in America's young people and in ourselves. The economic and cultural future of our nation depends on there being a trained, literate, competent, skilled population. The miracle drugs of tomorrow, the rockets to the moon, the agricultural and other breakthroughs that have won this country its primary position in the 20th century have not been by accident. They are the result of material resources combined with ingenuity and hard work. Cuts in student aid programs are a false economy that we will learn to regret in the years to come.●

NEVER UNDERESTIMATE THE POWER OF A DEFICIT

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, the Reagan administration has recently indicated it can live with budget deficits. At least, that is what his Council of Economic Advisers said. After a fine start toward getting our budget in balance, I personally find this very discouraging. In that respect, I was struck by two letters that appeared in the "Letter To The Editor" column of the New York Times of December 17, 1981. The first was from Irving Leveson of the Hudson Institute and was predictably critical. The second letter was from Prof. John Kenneth Galbraith and was most startling. Somewhat sadly, I found that I agreed with both letters. No budget deficit is good. I commend both letters to the attention of my colleagues.

NEVER UNDERESTIMATE THE POWER OF A DEFICIT

TO THE EDITOR

The comments on the Federal budget deficit by three members of the President's Council of Economic Advisers ("Reagan Aides Defend Deficits," news story Dec. 9) were unsettling. Coming on the same day as the report that the deficit could reach $109 billion, they sounded like "Dr. Strangebuck, or How I Decided to Stop Worrying and Love That Deficit."

Messrs. Weidenbaum, Niskanen and Jordan are telling the American people that deficits aren't inflationary, or at least need not be. While that is in one sense technically correct, it is so misleading as to encourage inaction or to support policies opposite to those required.

A budget deficit of any size can be prevented from adding to inflation, but only if we are willing to accept sufficiently high interest rates. High rates only shift the social costs of a deficit from inflation to slower economic growth. Either way, they contribute to stagflation.

Some observers, like former council member William Nordhaus, minimize the importance of the deficit by emphasizing that what counts is the size of the deficit that would prevail if the economy were operating at full employment. But consider how the full-employment budget balance has changed.

For many years the policy appropriately had been to run a surplus in times of full employment. This would cool inflationary pressures just as a planned deficit would help to cushion declines. In the 1970's, the relationship shifted, so that there were larger deficits in a recession of a given severity and the budget would reach a balance rather than a surplus at full employment. Today, we cannot even expect to reach that balance.

The deficit now operates more strongly than ever to create a bias toward inflation and/or slower growth. While reversing the budget deterioration will be difficult, it must be done. Denying the problem will only make matters worse.

IRVING LEVESON,
Director of Economic Studies,
Hudson Institute.

TO THE EDITOR

Your Dec. 9 article tells of a large convocation of presumptively conservative economists under the auspices of the avowedly conservative American Enterprise Institute in Washington. The subject was inflation.

All so assembled, with the exception of Herbert Stein, a member and chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers in earlier Republican times, are reported as approving or, at a minimum, acquiescing in the impressive budget deficits now in prospect under the fiscal designs of President Reagan.

There was a time when conservative economists were thought to be principled, even dogmatic, in their commitment to fiscal austerity. And a liberal can join in hoping that this might still be the case when, as now, a recurrence of inflation remains a serious threat, an incomes and prices policy is eschewed and an absence of fiscal restraint thus means an even greater reliance on murderous interest rates and tight money. Or more inflation.

It is not my instinct, God forbid, to instruct my conservative friends on matters of public virtue. But one can hardly avoid the thought that partisan loyalty has here replaced professional conviction—that an Administration that calls itself conservative can do no wrong.

In proof, one has only to contemplate what would have been the response at that distinguished symposium were a similar budget deficit being similarly defended by a liberal President and Administration.

BRAILOVSKY CASE RAISED AT MADRID TALKS

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, it is no coincidence that Viktor Brailovsky was arrested in his Moscow apartment shortly after the opening of the Madrid review meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE) in November 1980. Brailovsky was silenced by the Soviet authorities as a symbol of their intransigence toward the family reunification provisions included in the Helsinki accords.

Following his arrest, Brailovsky was charged with defaming the Soviet state and, in what is generally considered to have been the most significant show trial since Anatoly Shcharansky was convicted of treason in July 1978, Brailovsky was sent into exile for 39 months.

Viktor Brailovsky is best known for his work in publishing "Jews in the U.S.S.R." and for the scientific seminars he held in his apartment with others who had lost their jobs because they had applied to emigrate.

As a scientist and a leading member of the "refusenik" community in Moscow, Viktor Brailovsky played an important role in focusing attention on the Soviet Union's obligations to adhere to the provisions of the Helsinki accords.

These facts have not been lost on the U.S. delegation to the Madrid Conference. Chief U.S. negotiator to the talks, Ambassador Max Kampelman, has taken the lead in raising this case as well as other examples of violations of the human rights accords.

In this way, Viktor Brailovsky's exile continues to be a matter of great concern for the West.

Together with repeated reminders from the Congress and from other Government officials we can impress upon the Soviet Union the importance of Soviet compliance with the Helsinki accords, and in particular the right to emigrate.

Ambassador Kampelman's exemplary performance in defense of human rights at the Madrid Conference is evident in a recent letter I received in which he details the West's response to the Brailovsky case at the talks. I commend the letter to my colleagues and urge our delegation to the Madrid Conference to continue its good work.

The letter follows:

CONFERENCE ON SECURITY AND COOPERATION IN EUROPE,
December 18, 1981.

HON. BARNEY FRANK,
U.S. House of Representatives, Longworth House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FRANK: Knowing of your interest in Viktor Brailovsky, given your dual capacity as Mr. Brailovsky's attorney and as a concerned Member of Congress, I would like to assure you of the continued concern that has been expressed in the case by Western delegations at the Madrid meeting.

As of the close on the latest phase of the meeting on December 18, 1981, Mr. Brailovsky's name has been mentioned in formal session on:

November 17, 1980—In plenary speech by U.S. Ambassador Kampelman.

December 3, 1980—In plenary speech by Philip Handler, President, U.S. Academy of Sciences and senior advisor to the U.S. delegation.

Phase I (fall, 1980)—Twice by U.K. Ambassador Wilberforce in plenary speeches.

Phase I (fall, 1980)—In Subsidiary Working Body on the Helsinki Final Act Principles by U.K. representative.

Phase I (fall, 1980)—In Subsidiary Working Body on the Helsinki Final Act's Human Contacts (Third Basket) provisions by Sweden.

June 19, 1981—In plenary, U.K. Ambassador Wilberforce protested sentencing of Brailovsky and is supported by U.S. Ambassador Kampelman in a right of reply.

When the Madrid meeting reconvenes next year, my delegation will continue to insist that the Soviet Government respect the humanitarian provisions of the Helsinki Final Act and we, together with other Western delegations, will do all that we can—both publicly and privately—to secure the release of Mr. Brailovsky and other prisoners of conscience in the Soviet Union.

With you, I hope that the efforts we take in Madrid, together with those undertaken by the Congress and concerned organizations and individuals throughout the world, will speed the day when the Brailovsky family shall live together in freedom.

ATMOSPHERIC ACIDITY

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, last session, we were showered with acid rain proposals the preponderance of which placed the blame for acid deposition on the Midwestern coal-consuming States rather than on New England where some of the effects of this phenomenon are felt, predominantly with respect to increasing fish kills in rivers and lakes.

I have viewed these measures with suspicion because there seems to be general consensus within the scientific community that not enough is known on the causes and effects of acid deposition to warrant immediate and new controls on emission of sulfur dioxide from coal-burning powerplants and from only coal-fired powerplants in the Midwest.

For this reason, I introduced H.R. 5055, the Acid Precipitation Accelerated Review and Reporting Act which accelerates the present 10-year Federal interagency acid precipitation task force study to 5 years with the hopes that before Congress acts on this matter it will be equipped with sound scientific data on the causes and effects of acid deposition.

Recently, my doubts concerning the validity of the arguments placing the blame for acid deposition solely on the Midwest were reinforced by the preliminary results of a study being conducted by the University of Rhode Island. So far, this study indicates that acid deposition in the Northeastern States may be derived from sulfur dioxide emissions of local origin rather than from the Midwest. Following is a report by the university on these preliminary results.

ELEMENTAL TRACERS AND SOURCES OF ATMOSPHERIC ACIDITY FOR THE NORTHEAST—A STATEMENT OF NEW EVIDENCE

(By Kenneth A. Rahn)

During the last several years, a picture of acid precipitation in the Northeast (here defined as the six New England states plus New York and New Jersey) has been built up which attributes the major sources to the Midwest, some 1000 km distant. Evidence in support of this view is now massive, and includes the strength of SO_2 sources in the Midwest (more than five times as much as in the Northeast), association of highest concentrations of sulfate aerosol with air-mass trajectories from the Ohio River Valley, and "blobs" of sulfate haze which can be followed from the Midwest to the Northeast. During the last two years, an impressive number of articles has appeared in scientific and popular publications attesting to this picture. As a result, two bills have recently been introduced in the Senate (Mitchell et al., and Moynihan), each of which would place the burden of curbing SO_2 emissions on the Midwest.

Although widely accepted, this picture may be weaker at its core than is generally realized. The evidence for midwestern sources of acidity is quite indirect and circumstantial: (1) Just because the Midwest emits five times as much SO_2 as the Northeast, it does not automatically follow that northeastern acidity should be dominantly midwestern in origin—the 1000-km distance from the Midwest must negate much of this difference, especially in summer, when weaker circulation favors local pollution; (2) The argument from air-mass trajectories implies little about whether a pollutant at the end of the trajectory has actually travelled the entire distance; (3) Tracking a blob of haze is not hard proof either, for there is no way from photographs or visibility alone to determine how often the blob has renewed itself during transport. A blob may represent movement of certain meteorological conditions as much as it represents transport of mass.

During the last decade, our understanding of the true role of long-range transport in air pollution has increased dramatically. Much of this knowledge has come, however, from studies of areas such as Scandinavia or the Arctic, whose sources of pollution are relatively easy to assign, because there is a single strong source far upwind and clean areas between it and the remote receptor region. But in the eastern United States there are no such clean areas; air travelling long distances is inevitably exposed to emissions all along its path. This makes it much more difficult to assign sources properly.

Everybody agrees that acid precipitation has to be reduced, the sooner the better, and that this will involve curtailing emissions in the areas most responsible for it. But with such a huge price tag ($2-4 billion per year for the new bills), it would seem of the highest priority to learn with certainty which sources are most important before attempting massive remedial action. Until recently, we at the University of Rhode Island, who are staunch advocates of the importance of long-range transport of air pollution because of our research in the Arctic, would have gone along with the new bills without a second thought. But we have quite accidentally produced some new data which cast doubt on part of the current picture, and, we believe, call for a more careful look at the entire system of sources and transport of acidity in the Northeast before major control action strongly oriented toward a particular region is taken. It is the purpose of this document to alert the scientific and legislative communities to the existence and preliminary interpretation of these results.

The new evidence comes from a system of elemental tracers of source areas of pollution which we have developed for our studies of the Arctic atmosphere, to which large amounts of pollution aerosol are routinely transported long distances during winter. During the last 18 months, we have learned how to choose combinations of elements to form unique signatures of several source areas of pollution aerosol, which can be used to discriminate their aerosols from one another even after transport of thousands of km. The first such tracer we developed, the ratio of excess or noncrustal Mn to excess V (called the Mn/V ratio for short), has allowed us to resolve aerosol from the eastern United States, Europe, and the central Soviet Union, all after transport to the Arctic. This was the first application of elemental tracers to large-scale source areas; its success has convinced us that this new approach will rapidly become a powerful tool in atmospheric science. In the future, many more elemental tracers will be developed and applied to a wide variety of problems that might otherwise be intractable.

While working with the Mn/V ratio in the Arctic, we realized that it could also be applied to regional-scale transport within the eastern United States, for the Mn/V ratios of the Midwest and the East Coast are quite different, and can be told apart easily. This approach should enable us to document the sources of atmospheric acidity with a greater resolution than was possible previously. By measuring Mn and V in the Northeast during episodes of sulfate and acidity and during nonepisodic periods, we felt that we could confirm the midwestern origin of episodes: Mn/V ratios of episodic aerosol should be midwestern, but Mn/V ratios between episodes should be more northeastern.

Only recently have we had proper data with which to do this. There are now three data sets available. The first, from High Point, New Jersey, during the summers of 1976 and 1977, showed an eightfold difference in Mn/V ratio between air masses coming from the Midwest and those coming from the East Coast. As expected, air masses from the Midwest carried higher sulfate. The other two data sets, from Watertown, Mass. and Narragansett, R.I., gave an entirely different picture, however, and had essentially no midwestern Mn/V ratios. The data from Rhode Island, which is comprised of over 60 samples spanning both summer and winter, showed no correlation at all between sulfate and excess Mn, excess V, or Mn/V ratio. Strong episodes of sulfate were seen, but they were usually accompanied by an eastern Mn/V ratio. Overall, the aerosol appeared to be strikingly eastern—at least 90% of the Mn/V ratios were purely eastern in summer; in winter, the aerosol was somewhat more varied but still markedly eastern. (Other elements in these same samples appeared to indicate the detectability of the plume from the Sudbury, Ontario INCO smelter which emits 10 percent of the North American SO_2. Elements characteristic of this plume appeared nearly every time a strong cold front passed through Rhode Island, when the winds came briskly from the NW for a day or so. Interestingly, levels of sulfate during these periods were very low. Because of the importance of this source to Canadian-American exchange of acidity, and because it is such a striking example of the power of elemental tracers, we intend to pursue this topic.)

The Rhode Island data did contain four cases of "midwestern" Mn/V ratios, however. But only one of these could be traced to the Midwest, and that came during a period of extremely strong westerly flow during winter, and brought low sulfate. The other three cases could be traced by meteorological maps to the Southeast, via a new and unexpected type of atmospheric transport. Apparently, air from the Southeast first travelled eastward over the ocean, then northward to New England under the influence of a strong upper-level trough. This pathway allowed it to miss the entire East Coast, and hence to preserve its southeastern signature.

What does all this new evidence mean? We do not propose that it challenges the basic picture of long-range transport in the Northeast—such an allegation would be premature. But we think it is significant that the first attempt to confirm the accepted picture through direct evidence has given such unexpected results. Instead of a monolithic Midwestern source, the Northeast is now seen to have a rich variety of sources and transport, a complexity that was totally unanticipated: the Sudbury plume can be detected after transport across the entire Northeast; the Southeast pollutes New England; the East Coast pollutes itself considerably. Ironically, the (midwestern) source that we had expected to find the most easily has proven the hardest to detect.

Perhaps some of our results depend on the nature of the technique (Mn and V supply information on the primary submicron aerosol, whereas sulfate and acidity are secondary, hence may have different origins); perhaps not. But whatever the eventual outcome, it would seem prudent to exploit the new resource of elemental tracers by undertaking a systematic study of the multi-elemental composition of aerosol and precipitation throughout the Northeast and in the various possible source areas. Such an investigation should go far toward revealing the sources and transport of acidity in the Northeast.●

NICARAGUA: THEY DID IT AGAIN

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, the evidence continues to mount that we were sold the same bill of goods in Nicaragua that we were sold in Cuba, when the skids were put under Batista. The only way to rid Nicaragua of Somoza was to back the Sandanistas and their coalition, the Department of State assured everyone. However, it was plain for all to see that the Sandanistas had the guns and were Marxists. There was no doubt as to who would prevail and what the ideology would be if they won. Therefore, I was pleased to see the article by M. Stanton Evans in Human Events of December 26, 1981, which discussed this subject. One wonders how many times we have to make this same mistake? The item follows:

NICARAGUA: THEY DID IT AGAIN

(By M. Stanton Evans)

History is repeating itself in the Caribbean, and so are the alibis.

Back in the 1950s, American liberals fervently backed the cause of Fidel Castro in his alleged "liberation" of Cuba. They denied he was a Communist or a totalitarian. Once in power, of course, he lost little time in proving them mistaken: aligning himself with Moscow, liquidating and jailing non-Communist opponents, busily exporting Marxist revolution elsewhere.

The alibi for all this was that no one could have predicted Castro would turn out a Communist—that, indeed, he had been pushed into the arms of Moscow by our hostility. Ignored in such discussions was his declaration that he had been a Communist since he was in college, but had covered up that fact to ease his way to victory.

Now, an emerging body of evidence makes plain, it is happening again in Nicaragua.

With Castro's help, the Sandinista guerrillas in that country waged a bloody and ultimately successful war against the government of Anastasio Somoza. Vital to their effort were the backing of U.S. liberals, favorable coverage in our media, and the covert support of the Carter government, which cut off aid to Somoza and pressured others to do likewise.

As noted in a recent research paper from the Council for Inter-American Security, the Nicaraguan pattern since the Sandinista takeover has repeated the Cuban experience in almost every detail. Over the past two years, the Sandinistas have moved rapidly to construct a Marxist police state—and, except when making noises for our benefit, take little pains to conceal that fact. They are, in addition, helping export Marxism to other nations, also in the Cuban pattern. A few particulars:

In August of this year, Sandinista Defense Minister Humberto Ortega declared "we are anti-Yankee, we are against the bourgeoisie" and that "Marxism-Leninism is the scientific doctrine that guides our revolution." He added that "without Sandinism we cannot be Marxist-Leninist, and without Marxism-Leninism we cannot be revolutionary."

In October another Sandinista leader journeyed to the United Nations where he announced his country's "solidarity" with Cuba, Libya, North Korea, the PLO, and other Marxist elements—but not with any democratic ones. This was congruent with an earlier statement of solidarity with the Soviets, including support for the invasion of Afghanistan.

To help enforce "Marxism-Leninism" in Nicaragua, the Sandinistas have relied heavily on their Cuban mentors. An estimated 3,000 Cubans are in the country. The new regime conducts indoctrination courses in the schools and has set up "neighborhood committees" to spy out deviationists, in imitation of the Cuban model.

Repression is the order of the day. Property has been confiscated, elections postponed, political opponents assassinated and jailed, businessmen locked up, the electronic media taken over, and the daily paper La Prensa subjected to constant harassment, including five closedowns this year.

As has been well-documented by our State Department, Nicaragua is a staging point for the Marxist attack on El Salvador—with Soviet and other supplies being transshipped from Cuba for use against the Salvadoran government. This replicates the lavish assistance that Castro gave the Sandinistas' own revolution.

Small wonder that Jose Esteban Gonzales, head of the Nicaraguan Human Rights Commission, says the regime is "totalitarian" in nature and is "based on the objectives, programs and methods of the failed Cuban revolution."

The Sandinistas, Gonzalez charges, have used the power of the state and organized tactics of intimidation "to attack the members and destroy the officies of the political, labor, religious and humantarian organizations and the news media of democratic orientation."

These grim assessments are confirmed by other sources—including Jose Francisco Cardenal, a former official in the Sandinista government, and the Organization of American States, whose human rights investigators, in guarded verbiage, cite numerous cases of flagrant violation.

Again, confronted with such evidence, the liberals in this country who helped engineer the Sandinista takeover plead total ignorance and suggest that we have "driven" the Sandinistas into the totalitarian orbit by our hostility. Since the Sandinista leaders were trained and guided by Castro to begin with, and since they were nuzzling up to Moscow even as we were voting them $75 million in foreign aid, this seems a bit implausible.

The true character of the Sandinistas is self-evident—as is the sincerity of their U.S. apologists.●

INCREASING OUTSIDE EARNINGS LIMITATION

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, as one who helped draft the sweeping and necessary ethical reforms of 1978, I am very concerned over recent action which has led to an increase in the limit on outside income of Members of Congress is permitted to earn.

The limitation on outside earnings adopted in 1978 is one of the most important of the several reforms adopted that year, all of which were designed to restore public confidence in the Congress as an institution and in the actions and objectivity of each Member.

The increase in the outside earnings limitation from $9,009 to $18,198 was adopted on December 15 by a nonrecorded voice vote. This reversed earlier House action on October 28, when a proposed change in the limitation was defeated in a recorded vote of 271 to 147. I voted not to increase the earnings limitation.

Whether one supports or opposes increasing permissible outside earnings, however, the House should not have resolved the issue without a recorded vote.●

SMALL BUSINESS IN AMERICA

HON. JACK BRINKLEY

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to share with Members of this body the statement of Mr. Morton A. Harris, president of the Small Business Council of America. This presentation was made today before the Subcommittee on Labor of the Committee on Labor and Human Resources of the U.S. Senate.

Not only is Mr. Harris a scholar, but he is a practical man who personally uses the tools of his trade. Theory alone does not clothe a man with the distinguishing characteristics which enable him to be a national voice. Rather, it is that rare combination of theory and experience which go to the full measure of a man and to the recommendations which he is making.

Morton has earned the respect of his peers, and he has provided outstanding leadership as chief elected officer of this fine business council. It is with confidence that I commend his statement to your attention.

STATEMENT OF MORTON A. HARRIS, ESQUIRE, PRESIDENT, SMALL BUSINESS COUNCIL OF AMERICA, INC.

Good Morning Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee: I am Morton A. Harris of the law firm of Page, Scrantom, Harris, McGlamry and Chapman of Columbus, Georgia. I am officially here today in my capacity as President of the Small Business Council of America, Inc. (SBCA). However, I am also appearing as an individual who has been involved in the private pension industry for over twenty years and who is vitally concerned with the continued viability and growth of a sound private pension system.

SBCA is a national organization of over 1,400 small business men and women located in 46 states. A major thrust of SBCA's efforts, since its founding in 1979, has been to identify problems in the small employer plan area and to seek solutions through the regulatory agencies or the Congress. SBCA's constant theme has been to urge the creation of incentives—and the elimination of disincentives—for the establishment and maintenance of private employee benefit plans by small business employers.

As an initial matter, I would like to re-emphasize the basic point I made when I testified before this Subcommittee last November. SBCA strongly supports the thrust of S. 1541 and its companion in the House, H.R. 4330, introduced by Congressman John Erlenborn of Illinois. The stated purposes of this legislation—to encourage the establishment and growth of employee benefit plans and to encourage savings to meet the needs of employees and their families in the event of death, disability or retirement—are consistent with everything for which SBCA stands.

Mr. Chairman, in my view, the ERISA problems of small plans and small employers resulted, in no small measure, from the fact that ERISA was drafted with little consideration given to precisely how the reporting, disclosure, and administrative burdens—including the prohibited transaction provisions—would fall on small plans. I really cannot fault this Committee or others involved in drafting ERISA for this deficiency. Small businesses and small plans were relatively silent when ERISA went through the legislative process. The focus of the small business legislative effort was at the eleventh hour and was devoted to insuring that small plans could retain a sufficient tax advantage to encourage their continued growth and to insuring that there was no tax discrimination against small plans. In focusing on these problems, small business interests paid little attention to many of the administrative provisions of ERISA. I am delighted to note that since ERISA was enacted, small plans and small businesses, and indeed the entire private pension industry, will be outspoken when further employee benefits legislation is considered.

Over the coming months, SBCA will be communicating with this Committee, and with the House Education and Labor Committee, with respect to details of the pending bills. For today, I will confine my remarks to comments on some specific sections of Subtitle E of Title III of S. 1541—"Amendments to Fiduciary Responsibility Provisions".

SECTION 3504

Section 3504 provides amendments relating to ERISA's cofiduciary responsibility provisions. It makes clear that if fiduciary duties have been properly allocated, then a named fiduciary to whom a specific duty has not been allocated will not be held liable for an act or omission with respect to that duty by the named fiduciary to whom that duty has been allocated. We believe the changes incorporated in Section 3504 adopt what the Congress originally attempted to do when it dealt with the subject of cofiduciary responsibility in ERISA. We believe named fiduciaries should be able to allocate duties and to reply on such allocation for protection, absent knowing participation in another's action. The ability to allocate duties and to rely on such allocation is particularly important to small employers who often do not have the "in-house" resources to administer plans and manage plan assets. Such employers rely heavily on outside fiduciaries to handle such matters, and should be able to limit their potential liability by proper allocation of duties to other responsible fiduciaries.

SECTIONS 3505–3510

Sections 3505 through 3510 provide amendments relating to the prohibited transaction provisions of ERISA.

Section 3505 essentially provides for a return to the "adequate consideration" or "arms length" standard for permissible "party-in-interest" transactions. We strongly support this change. We believe that the current ERISA approach—which adopts a blanket, statutory presumption that "party-in-interest transactions are "bad", subject to their being proven "good" in a lengthy administrative procedure—is simply too stringent and costly for the resulting benefits to participants. Although some transactions which would not have been in the interest of participants or beneficiaries undoubtedly have been prevented under this approach, we believe that many more transactions, which would have benefited all concerned, have simply not been attempted. We recognize that much progress has been made since 1974 in granting needed exemptions and in refining the exemption process. However, the inherent costs and delays still preclude many small employers from entering into perfectly legitimate transactions which would be in the best interests of all concerned. Given that the "prudent man" and "exclusive benefit" rules will remain applicable to all investment decisions involving a plan, we would contend that so long as any transaction is "arms length" and for adequate consideration, it should be permitted. In taking this position, we are very mindful that under S. 1541, participants and beneficiaries will continue to have significant rights to comprehensive disclosure of plan activities and to causes of action for violation of the "prudence" and prohibited transaction rules. We are also mindful that the appropriate regulatory agency will retain its auditing and enforcement functions.

Section 3508 would amend ERISA Section 408 to provide specific statutory exemptions from the prohibited transaction provisions for certain common transactions involving "substantial employers". We support these exemptions. For example, the lease of property by a trust to an employer, under lease terms which are commercially competitive and where holding the property itself is "prudent", could be very beneficial to a plan and its participants as well as to the employer. Similarly, loans by a trust to an employer at "arms-length" interest and subject to adequate security could be beneficial to all parties concerned. Given the built-in safeguards of Section 3508, to require prior administrative approval of such transactions would involve a cost in terms of time and money which is simply not justified by the extra "benefit" to participants and beneficiaries.

Although we support Section 3508, we would suggest some additions. First, we would recommend a clear direction to the appropriate regulatory agency, preferably in the statute itself, that the exemptions contained in ERISA Section 408 are applicable to transactions described in ERISA Section 406(b) as well as Section 406(a). If the stated conditions for a statutory exemption are met, the exemption should be available regardless of whether the party-in-interest is also a fiduciary. Further, we would recommend a statutory direction in ERISA Section 408 confirming that a voluntary, nondeductible contribution of property other than money by a participant to a plan does not constitute a "sale or exchange" and, therefore, does not constitute a prohibited transaction. Individuals should be encouraged, not discouraged, to save for retirement, and often a voluntary contribution of property is more feasible than a cash contribution.

Section 3510 would extend the administrative exemption procedure to persons who are "owner-employees". We see no valid reason for the current provision in ERISA Section 408(d) which precludes "owner-employees" from availing themselves of the exemption procedure, and would submit that the preclusion was inadvertent when adopted. We strongly recommend the correction contained in Section 3510.

Mr. Chairman, that concludes my prepared remarks. I will be delighted to respond to any questions that you or the other members of the Committee may have.●

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO THE HONORABLE ROMEO T. DEVITA OF PATERSON, N.J., OUTSTANDING HOUSING DIRECTOR, COMMUNITY LEADER AND GREAT AMERICAN

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, January 29, the residents of my congressional district, State of New Jersey will gather in testimony to the outstanding public service rendered to our people by one of our most distinguished citizens, community leader, and good friend, the Honorable Romeo T. DeVita, who is retiring from this esteemed office of executive director of the housing authority of the city of Paterson where he has served with distinction for over three decades. I know that you and our colleagues here in the Congress will want to join with me in extending our deepest appreciation for all of his good works and share great pride in the success of his achievements with his good wife Olga and their children.

Mr. Speaker, as Romeo DeVita retires as Paterson's housing director, we applaud his lifetime of dynamic and dedicated service to people in the crusade for individual rights, quality of life, and the dignity of man, particularly in the sphere of people's essential needs in housing. His attainment of the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development's Certificate of Appreciation Award in recognition of his personal involvement and leadership for 25 years in developing decent housing is a manifestation of his sincerity of purpose and accomplishment in this area of national concern.

Romeo was born in southwestern Pennsylvania and we are proud to boast that he settled in the city of Paterson with his family when he was 2 years old—an almost native of this great city of industry. He attended local schools and has a master of arts degree in administration from Montclair State College, his alma mater also for his undergraduate degree.

He served our country with courage and valor as a member of the U.S. Air Force during World War II, 1942–46, and has many decorations and awards for his exemplary military service. Among his treasured service awards is the national citation he received for distinguished service in behalf of our disabled American veterans.

There are many who will relate his great prowess also in his athletic endeavors and others who will point to the illustrious career he could have had in professional football. When World War II was declared he declined an offer from the Detroit Lions to enter our Nation's Armed Forces. He was elected to Montclair's Athletic Hall of Fame October 7, 1978.

Mr. Speaker, there is so much that can be said about Romeo DeVita. He was the champion and the leading spokesman and organizer for public housing and social service programs for the tenants. His compassion, goodwill, and untiring efforts in seeking to resolve the problems and accommodate the needs of over 8,000 residents of public housing in the city of Paterson has been a hallmark of his career.

In addition to his overcrowded daily pursuits on behalf of public housing in the city of Paterson, he expended his evening hours organizing and running "small fry clubs," adult education programs, carpentry classes, tenant councils, and even a 4-H Garden Club. He liked people and liked getting involved.

Since his appointment as executive director of the housing authority of the city of Paterson on February 5, 1951, the quality of his leadership and expertise has surely enhanced the growth of the city and this is particularly evidenced in the unprecedented record development that has taken place in Paterson, particularly the building boom during the antipoverty days of the mid-sixties.

Throughout his lifetime Romeo has forged ahead with three very important and significant foundations to success: first, ability; second, personal desire to do the work and achieve; and, third, a feeling for people. We applaud his knowledge, training, hard work, and personal commitment that has enabled him to achieve the fullest confidence and strongest support of the people of our community.

May I also add that he is a fine educator of great note. Following World War II he returned home and joined the staff of Paterson Commercial College. He also found time to coach the Central High School basketball team in the evenings while attending college classes. As a recognized authority in the field of public housing, he has taught courses in housing management and has served as a coach and consultant to the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development in educating new executive directors of housing authorities.

Romeo DeVita has been a staunch supporter and active participant in many civic and community improvement programs and we applaud the quality of his leadership endeavors in the vanguard of public housing programs.

Mr. Speaker, it is indeed appropriate that we reflect on the deeds and achievements of our people who have contributed to the quality of our way of life here in America and I am pleased to call your attention to Romeo DeVita's lifetime of outstanding public service. As he retires his official leadership position as executive director of the housing authority of the city of Paterson, I respectfully seek this national recognition of his contribution to our country. We do indeed salute an outstanding housing director, distinguished citizen, community leader, and great American who has truly enriched our community, State, and Nation—the Honorable Romeo T. DeVita, of Paterson, N.J.●

THE HEIGHT OF LEGAL IGNORANCE

HON. RICHARD L. OTTINGER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring to the attention of my colleagues a vitally important "Dear Colleague" letter which was circulated by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, HAROLD WASHINGTON. The letter concerns the Reagan administration's outrageous decision to allow tax exemptions for racially segregated schools and the serious ramifications which might arise from legislation proposed by President Reagan to remedy this decision.

As HAROLD WASHINGTON notes, the legislation President Reagan intends to submit to Congress to remedy his original decision may have the opposite effect. He points out that:

> Such legislation could create a retroactive loophole by suggesting that the IRS was without prior authority to withhold exemptions. This would allow institutions which had been denied or, in reliance on IRS, had failed to apply for exemptions in years past, to sue the Government for recovery of taxes.

The fact is that this new legislation is simply unnecessary, because existing law provides for the IRS's authority to withhold tax-exempt status from private schools which discriminate against minorities. The U.S. Civil Rights Commission has concluded that the IRS continues to have such authority, the Supreme Court has upheld this authority, and three Presidents have enforced that authority. The President's argument that the IRS lacks the authority to deny tax exemptions to racist schools is sheer sophistry.

Indeed, the President's decision can only be seen as a callous attempt to appease the most rightwing elements in our Nation. No belated attempt to submit correcting legislation can change that. The President should simply admit his mistake on this point of law, and vigorously enforce the denial of tax exemptions to racist schools. I am including in today's RECORD Congressman WASHINGTON's letter and the U.S. Civil Rights Commission analysis of the administration's decision:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington D.C., January 20, 1982.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: I urge you to pay close attention to the attached Civil Rights Commission analysis of IRS's authority to withhold tax exempt status from private schools which discriminate against minorities.

While many Members are anxious to introduce new legislation, the Civil Rights Commission has concluded that IRS continues to have such authority as a matter of law.

Legal scholars concur, and a consensus is developing that additional legislation would be harmful. It would create a retroactive loophole by suggesting that IRS was without prior authority to withhold exemptions. This would allow institutions which had been denied or, in reliance on IRS, had failed to apply for exemptions in years past, to sue the government for recovery of taxes. The government would of course defend itself by arguing that IRS had the authority to withhold such exemptions prior to new legislation, a position that the courts have already sustained.

The Administration has already reversed itself on a matter of policy. It should now admit that it was mistaken on a point of law. The Congress will be asked to consider many important issues during the coming session. We do not have time to spin our wheels.

Thank you for considering this matter.

Sincerely,

HAROLD WASHINGTON,
Member of Congress.

STATEMENT OF THE U.S. COMMISSION ON CIVIL RIGHTS ON THE ADMINISTRATION'S DECISION TO REVOKE ITS REVENUE RULES AND TO GRANT TAX-EXEMPT STATUS TO SCHOOLS THAT DISCRIMINATE ON THE BASIS OF RACE

The Congress provided the legislative basis for denying tax exemptions to schools that discriminate because of race when it passed the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Title VI of that Act prohibits racial discrimination in federally assisted programs. Since tax benefits are a form of Federal assistance, tax exemptions are covered.

In 1971, the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia stated in Green v. Connally, 330 F. Supp. 1150 (1971), aff'd sub nom. Coit v. Green 404 U.S. 997 (1971) that "[t]he national policy against support for segregated education emerged in provisions adopted by the Congress in the Civil Rights Act of 1964 [Title VI]" and that the applying of Title VI to tax exemptions and deductions "is an expression of Federal policy against Federal support for private schools that practice racial discrimination." At a later point, the court continued:

"The Internal Revenue Code provisions on charitable exemptions and deductions must be construed to avoid frustrations of Federal policy. Under the conditions of today they can no longer be construed so as to provide to private schools operated on a racially discriminatory premise the support of the exemptions and deductions which Federal tax law affords to charitable organizations and their sponsors."

The decision in Green has been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The last three Administrations have supported a policy that has precluded the granting of tax exemptions to racially discriminatory schools. In accord with Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Internal Revenue Code, and the Constitution, the Commission believes that the President should direct the Internal Revenue Service to exercise its ample authority to deny tax exemptions to private schools that discriminate on the basis of race and the Internal Revenue Service should enforce the law.●

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, January 27, 1982

The House met at 3 p.m.

The Reverend Dr. W. Jean Richardson, moderator of the general assembly, Cumberland Presbyterian Church, Knoxville, Tenn., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and Eternal God, the Supreme Architect and Creator, the Loving Father, the Sovereign Lord of all the universe, how excellent is Thy name in all the Earth.

We acknowledge Your dominion over us. You are God of gods, King of kings, and Ruler over all rulers and nations. Your ways are above our ways. Yet, You are personal Redeemer and Friend.

We confess our human limitations as we confront the great issues of life. We plead for divine help.

Bless all Your servants in government everywhere; especially, those assembled here in this House. May they receive wisdom and strength beyond their normal abilities that by and from their actions truth will be honored, justice will be done, and peace established among us.

For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory, forever. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

REV. W. JEAN RICHARDSON

(Mr. JONES of Tennessee asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JONES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise today to introduce to my colleagues the Reverend W. Jean Richardson, moderator of the general assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, who gave today's opening prayer. As the only Cumberland Presbyterian in this House, it is a great honor for me to have him as my guest today.

Dr. Richardson graduated from Bethel College located in my congressional district in 1951. He also attended and graduated from the Cumberland Presbyterian Theological Seminary in 1955. He has devoted his life to the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, having served as pastor in a number of churches. In addition to his duties as moderator of the general assembly, he also serves as pastor of the Beaver Creek Church in Knoxville, Tenn. He is in Washington to attend a conference of participating Presbyterian denominations this week.

It is a great honor for me and for this Chamber to have the leader of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church with us today. Dr. Richardson has provided great leadership not only to this church but his community as well and is an outstanding example of how one makes his Christian commitment the central theme of his everyday life. Dr. Richardson, I am grateful for your being with us today.

DISCHARGE PETITION FOR HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 149, BALANCED BUDGET

(Mr. VOLKMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, last evening, President Reagan gave his first state of the Union address. It was a well delivered address, but I think he has missed the point.

Mr. Speaker, the Nation's economy is in desperate straits. Unemployment is nearing 10 percent and interest rates remain at restrictively high levels.

Mr. Speaker, I do agree with the President that it is time to get this country going again. However, I strongly disagree with his methods. He is obviously not going to give up the ghost of supply-side economics, so recovery will be long and painful.

Mr. Speaker, the economy will not improve until we lower interest rates and that will not occur until we reduce the huge budget deficits and balance the Federal budget. For these reasons, today I am filing a discharge petition on House Joint Resolution 149, the constitutional amendment requiring a balanced Federal budget.

Mr. Speaker, I strongly urge my colleagues to join me in this effort to bring this all-important legislation to the floor for consideration.

WE NEED ACTION NOW

(Mr. HARKIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Speaker, last night, as Ronald Reagan was giving the Warner Brothers version of "There is a light at the end of the tunnel," out in the grassroots of Iowa, the voters were rewriting the script.

Yesterday there was a special election held for a legislative seat for the Iowa House, District 84, in Burlington, Iowa. That seat had been held by a Republican who vacated it to move to California to find work. Burlington has an estimated unemployment rate of over 12 percent.

Yesterday the Democratic candidate, Elaine Baxter, swept that seat with 61 percent of the vote. That was the fourth straight Democratic victory in Iowa since November—three of which seats were previously held by Republicans.

The voters of Burlington said something yesterday which is going to be repeated throughout the Midwest this fall—that a movie script version of real life is fine for the theater, but is disastrous for our farmers and workers of this country.

Farm prices, in real terms, are at their worst level since the depression. Layoffs and plant closings are occurring all over Iowa. Our economy is in real trouble. We need action now, not theatrics.

PLANNING TO COVER YOUR OWN BURIAL COSTS SHOULD NOT BLOCK SSI OR MEDICAID ELIGIBILITY

(Mr. GLICKMAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, sometimes I just cannot believe the way Government programs operate. A whole range of States have programs designed to cover burial costs of individuals who have been on public assistance, but under the Federal medicaid and SSI programs, owning a burial plot or burial insurance program counts against you. In short, that means those programs encourage people to dispose of assets they have put into covering the costs of their own burial. In this way, we are discouraging people from taking care of themselves.

That does not make good sense, and it adds to the impression that the Federal Government is insensitive and uncaring. I hope we will straighten this out. To do so, I have introduced legislation today that would add to the list of assets to be excluded from the resources test for medicaid and SSI eligibility, burial plots, and burial insurance programs. I would welcome the cosponsorship of each and every Member of the House.

WE STILL HAVE THINGS TO LEARN FROM ROOSEVELT

(Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WILLIAMS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, as this week we commemorate the 100th birthday of Franklin Delano Roosevelt and the anniversary of the beginning of the New Deal for the American people, we will find in our observations that we can still learn things from Roosevelt and from the New Deal.

We can learn of both his accomplishments and his faults and I am sure we are going to hear a great deal about his faults.

Perhaps Roosevelt was best when talking about his own faults. I particularly like it when he said:

> Better the occasional sins of a government living in the spirit of charity than the consistent omissions of a government frozen in the ice of its own indifference.

WE MUST BALANCE THE BUDGET

(Mr. LEVITAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, last night, listening to the state of the Union speech I search my memory trying to remember back to the days when a balanced budget was important. I remember when we were told, and many of us believed, that high deficits would bring this Nation to economic ruin, would bring about greater inflation, would add more to the interest rate increases, but I did not hear any remedies proposed last night. In fact, I realized there was an ominous silence about the importance of a balanced budget, when we could expect one, and how it would be achieved.

What I did hear is that we are going to continue to have a $100 billion deficit this year. Those income tax reductions, Mr. Speaker, which were voted by Congress last year, to provide savings and investment to create more productivity will not be going into the private sector where they could accomplish that purpose, but they will have to be used to finance the $100 billion Federal deficit. I suggest that drain will not only destroy the economic recovery program, but will bring the American people, small businessmen and homebuilders, even higher interest rates and assured ruin.

We better get on with the problem of balancing the budget and bringing down these high deficits. That should be among our highest priorities and not forgotten, as the state of Union speech seemed to do last night.

DEFICITS MUST BE REDUCED

(Mr. PEYSER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Speaker, the President should have listened to Abraham Lincoln's advice when Lincoln said, "You can fool some of the people some of the time, but you can't fool all of the people all of the time."

The President never last night addressed the issues that really has the people of this country worried—the issues of unemployment, high interest rates, and the ballooning deficit.

Instead he talked about 1984, and giving the food stamp program back to the States, giving welfare back to the States. Can you imagine 50 food stamp plans, 50 welfare plans? It will not be the United States, it will be the disunited States.

I hope this Congress, as I said the other day, will have the guts to turn these programs down and get us on the track of reducing deficits and protecting the people.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE AND EMPLOYMENT SERVICES

(Mr. YATES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I am filing today a bill for an urgent supplemental appropriation in the amount of $210,490,000 for grants to States for unemployment insurance and employment services. Mr. NATCHER has authorized me to say that he joins with me on this bill. The purpose of the bill is to provide the funds that were stricken out by the Conte substitute continuing resolution which was passed in the waning days of the last session. As a result of that cut added to previous Reagan cuts, the employment services in almost every State of the union are a shambles—this at a time when almost 9 million people are unemployed. Such cuts at this time are ridiculous.

Let me tell you what is happening in my own State of Illinois.

First, Statewide layoffs and closings will begin on February 15 with the least senior employees being terminated.

Second, 22 Job Service offices and 11 WIN offices will be closed. After these closings, the State will have only 38 Job Service offices and 7 WIN offices.

Third, a total of 800 employees will lose their jobs. Of that amount, 500 will be employees who now work in Job Service offices and in the central and regional offices of that organization. The remaining 300 employees who will lose their jobs now work in the WIN office.

After the reductions, 475 employees will be left with the Job Service, a 49-percent reduction and 120 employees will be left with WIN, a 72-percent reduction. This is the office which attempts to secure full- and part-time jobs for AFDC welfare recipients.

When the bill was on the floor last December 10, the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. CONTE, said:

> Let me assure you we have carefully constructed this legislation to assure that first of all no state unemployment office may be closed as a result of this legislation. Second, no employees of these offices may be laid off as a result of this legislation. If his calculations are wrong, the administration will submit a supplemental budget refund to assure processing the higher workload.

Well, I say the administration's guesses are wrong and that we need action now to stop the massive layoffs in Employment Service offices. It is sheer stupidity to cut off and to stifle one of the few instruments we have to put people back to work.

This bill makes available an additional $210,490,000 from the unemployment trust fund to restore the Employment Service staffing level to the level of the March 1981 budget.

This will provide for a staff level of 24,800 nationwide. The present continuing resolution provides only 17,500 staff positions with an appropriation of $1,932,656,000. The funds appropriated here will provide a total of $2,143,146,000 in fiscal year 1982 for this account.

Mr. Speaker, I urge prompt action on my bill.

THE NEW FEDERALISM

(Mr. COLLINS of Texas asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COLLINS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, last night the President of the United States made a stirring and inspiring address on where we should go in 1982. There were two features of it that particularly impressed me. The first was this federalism approach, which means that in the future we can delegate better to the local areas so many of these functions the Federal Government now controls.

What it will means is that we will be able to cut waste. We will be able to cut fraud. We will be able to cut duplication.

The other strong point was he said there will be no tax increases. Now, we have got to absolutely stop taxing. We need more savings, and he said we will have more incentive to save.

Remember that in this country today we are only able to save 5 percent. In Japan they are saving 18 percent.

In order to create jobs, we need more savings in America.

TWO OUTLOOKS ON AMERICA

(Mr. WALKER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, last night we heard two different kinds of outlooks on America. We heard President Reagan inspire us with a message of progress and hope. And we heard the Democratic reply of doom and despair, that offered criticism, but nothing in the way of programs or alternatives.

But the Democrats' message told us a lot about their party and its concern about taxpayers. The centerpiece of their flashy production was a report on a series of trips around the country by the Ways and Means Committee. You may remember that there were complaints about those road shows here on the House floor some weeks ago and we were assured that they were serving a serious legislative purpose and they were not politically motivated.

Now we find out differently. The Democrats admitted to spending $65,000 for their partisan message last evening. What they did not say is that tens of thousands of taxpayer dollars were used to help produce that show. Tens of thousands of dollars were used that might better be directed toward reducing the Federal deficits that the Democrats profess to be so concerned about.

The fact is the Democrats today are no different from the Democrats who failed the country yesterday. They still believe in tax and tax, spend and spend, and elect, they hope, elect. They showed us so last night.

I KNOW THE QUESTION BUT WHAT IS THE ANSWER?

(Mr. ROUSSELOT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, the Washington Post today carried a story about the Democratic Party's filmed documentary on the state of the Union.

Now, after reporting the substance of that doom-and-gloom, snake-oil show biz, the Post stated—now, this is the Washington Post I say to my friends—this:

> While the film offered no specific alternatives, the Senate Democratic minority explored some "new ideas" with a familiar ring, some straight out of the New Deal—

That is according to the Washington Post.

Now, those ideas are 50 years old. There we have it, Mr. Speaker. The Democratic Party wants to go way back. It has no alternatives to the President's program, and its newest ideas are very old—50, 60, 75 years old. I do not know whether it has any of the former President's taped messages, but we will look forward to see if it does.

For years the Democrats have relied on political machines. These days they seem to rely on a time machine for journeys way back.

A DEMOCRATIC CAMPAIGN AD

(Mr. MORRISON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I think that last night's television response by the Democrats to the President's state of the Union address was unfortunate.

It obviously was prepared by a slick advertising agency from Madison Avenue. That part is OK; but they put it together without even giving the President the courtesy of listening to his speech and then reacting to his proposals.

The most pathetic part of the response prepared in advance was that there was not one positive alternative mentioned. It was strictly a campaign ad, at a time when America wants ideas and leadership.

It is obvious that we got ideas and leadership from the podium last night, not from the assortment of one liners that came in the name of a response.

THE TAXPAYER PAID DEMOCRATIC RESPONSE

(Mr. HILER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HILER. Mr. Speaker, following the state of the Union address in this Chamber last night, at least two of the major television networks aired a Democrat response to the President's message. It obviously was produced in advance of the President's speech at quite an expense, with a great deal of planning.

While the air time for this politically motivated response was provided without charge by the networks, its production, according to each network commentator, was paid for and provided by the Democratic Party.

I had the opportunity to watch this elaborate presentation on TV last night, and noted the extensive use of field hearings by the Ways and Means Committee on the supposed effects of Reaganomics. These hearings, which are supposed to be official functions of the committee and of this body, have been taxpayer funded. This includes air travel, lodging and meal expenses, and all expenses associated with the conduct of those hearings.

I wonder if the taxpayers who saw this show appreciated the use of these publicly funded hearings in a politically funded, politically produced, and politically motivated campaign presentation?

THE SENIOR AIDES PROGRAM SHOULD BE CONTINUED

(Mrs. HECKLER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. HECKLER. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago the President signed the Older Americans Act, which includes in its provisions the program for the senior aides. There is some talk about the survival of the program and I just would simply like to bring to my colleagues' attention the fact that the senior aides program which allows 127 communities in this Nation to benefit from the lifetime experiences of more than 10,000 of our senior citizens should be continued. These aides work in a variety of functions. They generally spend about 20 hours a week providing support for the local council on aging, for social service and Outreach programs, to the American Red Cross. They give of their knowledge and their experience while providing a very dependable source of manpower for the local communities.

These are individuals who have given a great deal to their country and have the ability to continue to serve. It is serving the American interests, helping local communities use local personal resources to solve local problems.

I support the senior aide program very strongly, as I do all programs for the elderly, and hope it can be continued.

THE GREAT SAN FRANCISCO 49ERS

(Mr. JOHN L. BURTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I just would like to take this minute to pay tribute to the No. 1 team in the country, the San Francisco 49ers, coach Bill Walsh, Joe Montana, Eddie DeBartolo, Jr., the owner, and the people of San Francisco who have waited a long, long, long time and we are No. 1. We will continue to be No. 1 for about 10 years.

THE NEW FEDERALISM HIGHWAY

(Mr. HOWARD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, last evening the President spoke about the new federalism and I just would like to touch for a moment on one small aspect of that.

Apparently the President indicates that we should take 2 of the 4 cents that presently goes into the Federal highway trust fund, turn that 2 cents back to the States, along with the total responsibility by the States for everything in highways other than the interstate program.

Well, the facts are from the Department of Transportation itself, Mr. Speaker, we cannot complete our responsibility to the interstate program through 1986 even with the total 4 cents that we have now, so we certainly cannot meet that responsibility with only 2 cents; so if we indicate that we are attempting to give it to the States, we could give them the responsibility for the 100,000 or more unsafe bridges that are not on the Interstate System, the primary system, the secondary system, the highway safety program, and as I understand it, the total mass transit program; if we gave them that total responsibility and did not give them any money back from the Federal Highway System, we still would not be able to complete our much-needed Interstate System if we keep the 4 cents; so that is basic arithmetic and that has to be considered during this session before we openly embrace some kind of a plan that is going to give us an awful lot in transportation for nothing, or for half price; so I think we have got to look into that. Those are the mathematical facts.

HOUR OF MEETING ON TOMORROW, THURSDAY, JANUARY 28, 1982

Mr. MURTHA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today, it adjourn to meet at 10 a.m. tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

LET POLAND BE POLAND: A DAY OF SOLIDARITY WITH THE PEOPLE OF POLAND

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 382) to permit the broadcasting in the United States of the International Communication Agency film "Let Poland Be Poland: A Day of Solidarity With the People of Poland, " and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I yield to the chairman of the committee for an explanation of the bill.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of House Joint Resolution 382, providing for the release within the United States of the International Communication Agency production "Let Poland Be Poland: A Day of Solidarity With the People of Poland."

At the outset, Mr. Speaker, let me note that there are many people responsible for this resolution but chief among them is my good friend and distinguished colleague from Illinois, the Honorable ED DERWINSKI. It has been my privilege to have served with Mr. DERWINSKI on the House Foreign Affairs Committee since he came to Congress almost 20 years ago. During those two decades and in a variety of ways, ED DERWINSKI has shown a devoted and determined concern for the people of Poland. His contribution to this resolution and many other legislative initiatives over the years affirms and confirms his contribution and interest in promoting peace and stability in the world.

Mr. Speaker, I also commend the ranking minority member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, our colleague, the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. WILLIAM BROOMFIELD, as well as the chairman of the Subcommittee on International Operations, the gentleman from Florida, Mr. FASCELL, for their efforts and cooperation on this resolution.

Since the imposition of martial law in Poland some 7 weeks ago, concerned and freedom-loving people throughout the world have sought various means to express their support for the Polish people and the democratic renewal movement spearheaded by Solidarity. Both symbolic and material support has been evident through candles in the window, public demonstrations, and food and medical shipments. As a means of extending that support and of helping to keep alive the process of democratic renewal in Poland, President Reagan has proclaimed January 30 to be "Solidarity Day."

In keeping with that same spirit, the International Communication Agency (ICA) will broadcast worldwide on January 31, a television program which will seek to provide important moral support to the people of Poland. It is my understanding our beloved Speaker is going to participate in this program. It will include messages by several heads of Western governments, and by well-known personalities in the entertainment field. ICA intends to beam this production via satellite to over 300 million people throughout the world.

The purpose of House Joint Resolution 382 is to waive limitations contained in section 501 of the U.S. Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948 on the dissemination of ICA materials in the United States. If Congress approves this legislation, the program will be broadcast in the United States on or around January 31, or within 30 days thereafter.

Mr. Speaker, the people of Poland need to know through every possible means that the American public and all freedom-loving people of the world are deeply concerned about their fate and strongly support the efforts of the Polish people to solve problems in their own way. By increasing awareness in the United States of this important objective, House Joint Resolution 382 deserves the unequivocal support of the Congress. I urge adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I am pleased to join with the House leadership in sponsoring this resolution which would allow the International Communication Agency to make available in the United States the film entitled, "Let Poland Be Poland: A Day of Solidarity with the People of Poland." The film would be aired on or about January 31 in commemoration of Solidarity Day.

It is appropriate and politically symbolic that we permit this film to be shown within the United States. The courageous actions of the Polish people and of the independent trade union, Solidarity, are historic in nature. At this moment, Poles are risking their safety and well-being in order to secure an additional measure of freedom. So that this momentous event may be fully appreciated in all its complexity, the American people should have the benefit of this excellent documentary—"Let Poland Be Poland."

I encourage all of my colleagues to support this resolution. By allowing this film to be shown in the United States, we are demonstrating our commitment to freedom worldwide.

We are also reinforcing our previous warning to the Soviet Union and their quislings in Warsaw that the United States cares what happens to the Polish people, and will not tolerate an erosion of the gains already won by Solidarity.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI).

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not have the time, but he may yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Michigan yield to me?

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROOMFIELD) intend to object? He has a reservation of objection. Does the gentleman intend to object?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to, obviously not, as a cosponsor.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI).

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to join my dear friend, the gentleman from Wisconsin, in this legislative effort.

The eyes of the world will be watching this program Sunday night. It should dramatically intensify the world's interest in the Communist oppression of Poland. Frankly, cooperation of free world nations with the United States in responding to the martial law imposed in Poland has been disappointing, and this dramatic film should serve to underscore the oppressiveness of the situation directed from the U.S.S.R.

The people of the United States have been inspired by the resistance of the Polish people to communism. We have seen their pride in Pope John Paul II, their support of the amazing development of the Solidarity movement, which has gained the support of the AFL-CIO for its tremendous effort to honestly represent the workers of Poland. Solidarity also is a legitimate nationalistic movement.

The martial law imposed by the Communist regime in Poland is only the latest episode in the tragedy afflicting the Polish people and all the peoples of Eastern Europe as a result of the Yalta agreement under which the Soviets have suppressed the freedoms for which they yearn.

I am especially pleased that our Speaker is among the distinguished persons who will be appearing in this film. I urge all Members to support this resolution waiving the prohibition against showing this film in the United States. The film is in the public interest and in the interest of freedom.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure there would not be any opposition to this resolution, but when the Members realize that our beloved Speaker is one of the participants in the film, that would certainly answer any questions anyone might have as to the validity of the resolution.

I am very pleased to support the argument made by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI). I would like to point out that what we are dealing with is a battle worldwide for the attention and, therefore, the minds of men. Even given this media world we live in these days, after 7 weeks now of martial law, the story in Poland is starting to fade away from the headlines, but the oppression by the Polish Army continues.

It is important that this dramatic program, which will have a worldwide impact, have the full support of the Congress. The other body is going to give it its full support. It is totally bipartisan. It is going to be one of the finest American efforts to dramatize the evils of communism that we have seen in many years. I think it serves a tremendous purpose in that it will dramatize the fight the Polish people are waging for freedom, and just as important, it will also dramatize the fact that communism is inherently weak, evil, and doomed to failure. That is a lesson that has to be learned again and again in many parts of the world where people sometimes even get tolerant of the Communist foreign policies and Communist machinations. I think this is a very practical program. This resolution deserves everyone's full support. I urge its adoption.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman from Wisconsin, our distinguished chairman, and the gentleman from Michigan, our ranking member, and the gentleman from Illinois, for bringing this measure to the floor at this appropriate time.

I urge my colleagues to fully support this endeavor of allowing our International Communications Agency to show the film "Let Poland Be Poland: A Day of Solidarity With the People of Poland," at a time when our entire Nation is going to commemorate January 30 as a day of solidarity with the people of Poland.

The people of Poland cherish the right of freedom. It is extremely important that we demonstrate our support of those people who are fighting for this priceless right, a right that we enjoy every day, and one that they are being denied.

I urge my colleagues to support this measure, and I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOMFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The people of Poland are the victims of repression, not the cause of it. Why, then, are they being punished for it?

While I consider this resolution a salutary one, the tragic fact is that the Poles are not merely hungry; they are starving. Our Government's cancellation of food aid to Poland has contributed to the suffering of the Polish people. Private organizations are doing their best to provide enough food to see them through the winter, but it is scarcely enough to provide the barest essential for the very young and the very old. Meanwhile, the poultry industry in Poland, its most important source of animal protein, is in danger of collapse because of the lack of grain feed.

I totally agree with the administration's efforts to encourage the Polish Government to lift martial law, to free those in arbitrary detention, and to restore the internationally recognized rights of the Polish people to free speech and association, but we are only adding to the suffering of the Polish people by penalizing their government through cutoff of aid. I urge the administration to find more appropriate means to let the Polish Government know that we will not tolerate repression, and to restore food shipments to its helpless citizens.

Like the prisoners of Fascist and Communist States to whom the political persuasion of the jailer does not make much difference, so also to those who are starving the refusal to offer lifesaving nourishment is a mortal wound, irrespective of the high principles behind the refusal.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL).

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I am constrained to ask for regular order.

Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman further reserving the right to object? He does not have control of the time.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I yield to the minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MICHEL).

Mr. MICHEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I certainly want to go on record as supporting this joint resolution.

Mr. Speaker, when the U.S. Information Agency—now called the International Communication Agency—was founded, Congress mandated that its media products, such as films, should not be distributed in the United States.

There was a good reason for this prohibition. No one wants to see a tax-supported information agency engaging in programs in this country.

There is a danger these programs could turn into partisan political propaganda. Even if such programs were merely perceived as propaganda by large numbers of Americans, it would not be right.

So the Congress, in its wisdom, put in this prohibition. I think it makes good sense. This is not to say, however, that the prohibition was meant to be absolute, as numerous subsequent actions by the Congress have indicated.

There have been instances in which the Congress granted the information agency a "waiver" so its films could be seen by the people who pay for it, the American taxpayers.

I suppose the most memorable of these exceptions to the rule was the film on the death of President John F. Kennedy, titled, "Years of Lightning, Day of Drums." This moving tribute to the slain President was shown on television, as well as in American theaters.

I am informed over 70 International Communication Agency films have been allowed to be shown in the United States by Congress.

So, there is ample precedent to show ICA material to the American people.

I believe the current ICA presentation entitled "Let Poland Be Poland: A Day of Solidarity With the People of Poland" is obviously one of those films the American people should get the chance to see. That is why I have joined our colleagues in cosponsoring a resolution that will allow it to be shown in the United States on or about January 31, 1982, and for 30 days thereafter.

It promises to be a moving tribute to the spirit of freedom so typical of our country, as well as of the people of Poland. It is nonpartisan and in the great tradition of American concern for human rights.

I would personally like to see more ICA material made available to the taxpayers, while still keeping the spirit of the prohibition against wholesale dissemination of their products.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. ECKART). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 382

Whereas the Polish Action Committee has called on free peoples everywhere to commemorate January 30, 1982, as a Day of Solidarity with the People of Poland;

Whereas the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), and other labor organizations throughout the world are commemorating this day with rallies and other observances;

Whereas the President has issued a proclamation declaring January 30, 1982, to be Solidarity Day in the United States;

Whereas the heads of state of many free world nations will join in observing Solidarity Day;

Whereas these observances will be broadcast worldwide, over television and radio, to an expected audience of over 300 million people; and

Whereas it is desirable that the people of the United States be aware of, and participants in, this worldwide effort: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That notwithstanding the second sentence of section 501 of the United States Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948 (22 U.S.C. 1461), the Director of the International Communication Agency may make the film entitled "Let Poland Be Poland: A Day of Solidarity With the People of Poland" available for broadcasting in the United States on January 31, 1982, or within thirty days thereafter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL).

Mr. FASCELL. I thank the chairman of the full committee for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in full support of this resolution.

Many times in the past, the Congress has asked that a film produced by the International Communication Agency for overseas viewing be released for distribution within the United States. We have asked for such exceptions in the law because we have felt the films to be of exceptional value in helping Americans to learn more about our own past and present, about the position of the United States in the world community, and about the policies and cultures of other nations.

House Joint Resolution 382 is not an unusual resolution. In fact it is in keeping with ICA's mandate which recognizes America's need to understand the aspirations of the people of other nations as well as the need to represent to overseas audiences the policies and varied cultures present in the United States.

This ICA film reflects U.S. concern for the plight of the Polish people. Its release would allow Americans to view a documentary which points out the trying events in Poland from a wide perspective. The film includes statements from many world leaders in addition to a statement from our own President. It presents the history of Solidarity and covers demonstrations of support from around the world for the Polish labor union. But most importantly, the release of this film would allow Americans, in a small way, to join with many other nations in celebrating the message of Solidarity and in mourning the suppression of that message in Poland.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FASCELL. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SWIFT. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this resolution. As a member of the Commerce Subcommittee on Telecommunications, and after consultations with my chairman, Representative TIM WIRTH, I wish to engage the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on International Operations (Mr. FASCELL) in a colloquy on the dissemination of this program to the American people by the Public Broadcasting Service.

The program to be shown, "Let Poland Be Poland," may be transmitted on the facilities of the Public Broadcasting Service for use by its member stations. I wish to stress that PBS would not be broadcasting this event as a PBS program. It is a production of the International Communication Agency. It would be distributed under a provision of the Public Broadcasting Act (section 396 (h)(2)) which permits excess satellite distribution capacity to be made available to other entities on a nondiscriminatory basis. This provision of law was not designed or intended to provide a means to transmit Government messages, but as a way to provide access to public broadcasting stations by independent producers. The circumstances of this particular broadcast via PBS, in other words, are unusual and exceptional.

An important issue is at stake here and should be understood by all concerned. Neither PBS, National Public Radio, nor any public broadcasting licensee should be viewed as having responsibilities or obligations that are different from commerical broadcasters in choosing to carry any programs—whether or not they are produced by the Government.

Under the Communications Act of 1934, television and radio stations reserve the right to exercise their independent broadcast judgment as to whether to carry news specials or other events. The choice is theirs—and not the Government's. This is a fundamental principle which the Government must respect at all times.

And it is of critical importance to public broadcasters, especially since they receive some Federal funding. But such funding is not and has never been provided in order to establish a Government-controlled medium carrying Government-produced messages. Indeed, the financing of public broadcasting has been structured precisely to insulate the system from political interference. Federal support for public broadcasting is intended to strengthen the very independence of editorial judgment that is so crucial to all broadcasters.

Nothing in the waiver we are considering today should be construed to compromise this basic tenet of communication law and practice.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I concur fully with the concerns expressed by the gentleman from Washington. This resolution is in no way intended to compromise the independence of public broadcasting. I agree that public broadcasters, no less than commerical broadcasters, must retain final judgment as to whether to broadcast any event, without interference by the Government. The sole intention in passing this resolution is to make this film available to interested Americans, as we have done with other ICA productions in the past.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he requires to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. BOLAND).

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the chairman of the full committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) for his work on this legislation, and I thank him for his efforts.

Mr. Speaker, I strongly support House Joint Resolution 382 and urge its overwhelming approval by my colleagues.

For more than 6 weeks the brave people of Poland have suffered oppression at the hands of their government. The spark of freedom which had been enkindled by the shipyard workers in Gdansk and which had spread throughout the country, had become too great a threat to Poland's Communist rulers. Martial law, internment and violence have replaced the traces of liberty which Solidarity had so painstakingly won.

It is important that individuals and nations that are offended by the military crackdown in Poland make those feelings known to the people of the world. One of the best ways of doing so is by insuring that the truth about the situation in Poland is widely broadcast. Congress has an opportunity to facilitate this effort by exempting the International Communication Agency's (ICA) film "Let Poland Be Poland" from the prohibition against domestic showing of the agency's films. Lifting the prohibition for this film will allow it to be shown in the United States during the upcoming worldwide day of solidarity with the people of Poland. It is a film which Americans should see and I hope that this Congress will take the steps necessary to insure that it will be shown.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join my good friend and colleague, the Honorable CLEMENT J. ZABLOCKI, chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, in support of House Joint Resolution 382, the bill I cosponsored with him to permit the broadcasting in the United States of the film produced by the International Communication Agency entitled, "Let Poland Be Poland: A Day of Solidarity With the People of Poland."

The Polish Action Committee has called on free peoples everywhere to join in the commemoration of January 30, 1982, as a Day of Solidarity with the people of Poland in their struggle against Communist repression, and the President has issued a proclamation declaring January 30 as Solidarity Day in the United States.

Many Poles have lost their lives, thousands have been prisoned, and basic freedoms of communication and movement have been severely curtailed or are nonexistent. We as Americans, along with free peoples all over the world, must join our hearts and our minds with the courageous Polish people, who have never lost their fervent desire for freedom. The shipyard workers, the coal miners, the farmers, and all the people of Poland must know that Americans will never be silent about this brutal war on their liberty.

The Communists in Moscow have worked to defeat the progress toward reform, even though both Communist Poland and the Kremlin have signed the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights and the Helsinki agreement with the United States and its allies, advoacting the freer movement of peoples, access to information, and humanitarian cooperation among peoples. Both nations are members of the United Nations and claim to believe in fundamental human rights, and in the dignity and worth of the individual.

On December 15, 1981, the Congress approved a resolution in support of the Solidarity Movement in Poland and its attempt to bring human dignity to Poland. The bill, which was adopted unanimously, places the responsibility for the present reign of terror in Poland on the Soviet Union.

The Congress also unanimously passed a resolution urging the President to halt the deportation of Poles in this country because of the grim situation in their homeland, and the administration has approved this recommendation.

The former Polish Ambassador to the United States has urged Americans not to be silent about the brutal war against freedom in Poland, and to give solidarity, support and humanitarian aid to the people of Poland.

On Solidarity Day, January 30, we join in our hearts and our minds with the brave people of Poland in their prayers for a just and peaceful end to their beloved country's difficulties.●

● Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of House Joint Resolution 382 to permit the broadcasting in the United States of the International Communication Agency film, "Let Poland Be Poland: A Day of Solidarity with the People of Poland." The suppression of freedom in Poland by the Communist rulers and the courage displayed by the Polish people serve to remind the Americans of the need to cherish our own freedoms and human rights. The film, normally intended for the millions who are unfortunately trapped in the captive nations of Eastern Europe, will be a vivid reminder to the American audience that the Polish people need our sympathy and prayers.

Mr. Speaker, House Joint Resolution 382 should also send a signal to the Communist rulers of Poland and Russia that we do not condone or tolerate their dictatorial actions.●

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, at this point I will ask the ranking minority member of the Foreign Affairs Committee if he has any requests for time under the regular order for the consideration and debating of this joint resolution.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I do not.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time. I move the previous question on the joint resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the joint resolution just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ECKART). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

THE UNEMPLOYED

(Mr. ECKART asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ECKART. Mr. Speaker, I listened intently last night, as we all did, to President Reagan as he outlined the state of the Union. But nowhere in his remarks did I find any reference to the condition of 10 million and more unemployed people in our country. The silence, I will tell you, was deafening.

Let me offer to you another view, a Republican view, of the Reagan program. I am entering into the RECORD the recent statements of Howard Collier, director of the Office of Management and Budget for the State of Ohio—who said, in part, that Ohio is suffering "cardiac failure" and that the Reagan program was a "disaster" for Ohio.

With record unemployment in Ohio; with a record State deficit in Ohio, with a record tax increase in Ohio, our Republican Governor, James Rhodes, has seen fit to call a spade a spade in his administration's candid assessment of the Reagan recession on Ohio.

I urge my colleagues from States who face economic difficulties to heed the warnings recently sounded in Ohio.

If left unabated—result in the destruction of much of State government and our system of public education at all levels.

The President is going for broke. And that is where we all will end up, if he does not succeed.

At this point I insert the following:

REMARKS OF HOWARD L. COLLIER, DIRECTOR OF OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET, STATE OF OHIO, JANUARY 19, 1982

TO THE STATE CONTROLLING BOARD

Thank you for allowing the OBM staff to make an extraordinary series of presentations here today. They are essential for clarity but, at best, will only give a view of the economic and social depression that has a firm grip on Ohio.

I will provide an introduction and some remarks I feel pertinent for today and the coming weeks.

I appear before you today with moral and professional resolve to uphold the Constitution. There is no choice. My oath and yours is exact.

But I also appear before you with a deepening personal sadness, grief, and despair. At best, the required acts I will take to uphold my constitutional responsibility and yours will—if left unabated—result in the destruction of much of State government and our system of public education at all levels.

Collectively, the members of this board and I have spent more than 100 man years—nearly always working cooperatively—in designing, drafting and implementing the spectrum of programs and safety nets that are now in unprecedented jeopardy.

The newest game to sweep the State—including the State house and media—is what kind of something is to blame for our current state of affairs. The popularity of Rubik's cube pales by comparison.

As a preface, I can say the speaker of the house, the President of the senate, the Governor, and members of both parties in both houses are virtually blameless.

The something is real.

Federal policies are destroying the industrial/agricultural heartland. Ohio is the heart of the heartland and is suffering cardiac failure.

A. Our steel industry has been given away by Federal policy, not by greedy management or corrupt unions. Dumping is transshipped, condoned or ignored or rationalized.

B. Grain embargoes—real and threatened—have made us an unreliable supplier for foreign markets.

C. Foreign auto imports are a glut while American manufacturers face restrictive tariffs in their attempts at the export market.

D. Federal interest policies have created a shambles of the construction and housing industries.

E. Federal tax/spending policies have created a trillion-dollar debt—growing daily—that must be constantly refinanced at higher cost, holding interest rates high.

F. The Federal Government has failed to adopt any concept of creative capitalism to provide the risk capital for the reindustrialization of the heartland.

G. The Federal Government's policies caused the Ohio depression and collapse of basic industry, but the Federal Government expects remaining Ohio business to be taxed to repay our massive unemployment compensation Federal loan. This course of action will only make Ohio products more costly, close more businesses and make the problem more severe.

H. Federal policy is closing B.E.S. offices at a time when hope in Ohio is in short supply.

I. Social benefits (food stamps, medicaid) are being cut at the time of our greatest need.

J. Ohio—even while in a deepening depression—receives the fourth lowest rate of return on its tax dollars sent to Washington (Texas, Connecticut, Indiana).

K. Because of this litany, the general assembly is forced to raise taxes on a base that is either flat or constricting.

These are a lot of "somethings" that placed us where we are today. The combined impact is only now becoming apparent.

Without a swift and massive shift in Federal policy toward Ohio, we can expect a worsening depression and a lengthy recession broken by episodic periods of growth. Those periods will provide hope but no long-term substance.

I could spend an hour explaining why the "sun belt" is not the reason for our current state of affairs. Our assets and location have improved since Ohio was first industrialized. It is important to understand but not critical to the presentation today.

Suffice it to say that the glass industry, the rubber industry, the steel industry, and the auto industry, will never again—in our lifetimes—provide jobs for Ohioans to the degree they did ten years ago, or five years ago.

Each of you has a feel for each one of these "somethings" that caused this meeting today. Your list might be longer than mine but would start with mine.

A specific indication for your concern was a little publicized appropriation you made to OMB in fiscal year 1983 to create an econometric model correlated to Ohio and the Ohio economy. Your intention was to quantify the difference between national models and the deflator effect of Ohio reality.

I am asking you for early funding so work can begin. It can be perfected for use by the next Governor and the next general assembly.

Done properly, it will save me from having to serve a fourth term under circumstances similar to today.

The technical presentation will be handled by Matt Filipic, assistant director, and our staff.

We are opposed to cutting welfare benefits. A cut at this time could precipitate the final collapse of the social safety net and clearly endanger life, health and safety.

Federal policies are already making holes in the net that Ohioans cannot afford to mend. Neither can we afford the risk of collapsing the net.

I don't expect any of you to applaud this decision, but I ask your support that the check of last resort is not diminished due to insufficient funds.

This question will be on a future special board agenda.

There are probably members in the four caucuses who will not agree with the exemption of welfare benefits from cuts, but it is a responsible and humane act.

We have attempted to expose all known problems at this single meeting. That is only to free us all to address solutions in an orderly manner.

I will be working through George Lord seeking your advice on such matters as definition of emergencies, procedures to accelerate the capital program—including the prison bill, to create jobs, and lastly, keeping you informed on an orderly basis of what OMB is doing through this crisis.

We have spent all of my first 19 days in office defining the potential problem, that chase is still incomplete.

Hopefully, we can start next week on solutions.

Thank you for your time, courtesy and patience.

A TRIBUTE TO 1ST LT. MICHAEL A. MATTSON

(Mr. DYSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DYSON. Mr. Speaker, the United States has a history rich in the tradition of heroes. Today, I rise to honor and commemorate a young man who demonstrated his valor in a quiet manner. Air Force 1st Lt. Michael A. Mattson, flying a night intercept training mission, was lost at sea on December 18, 1981.

It is wrong to think that bravery can only be exhibited under combat conditions, one must also include those individuals who go out day after day in the defense of their country where the risk of fatal injury is always present. Every military pilot knows that each flight, whether in peace or war, possesses an element of danger. Yet, they remain aware that a strong and highly trained Air Force is a vital ingredient to this country's survival. First Lieutenant Mattson knew and appreciated the freedoms which we enjoy in the United States. His service and dedication to our Air Force was evidence that he was willing to protect these rights.

Michael Mattson was born on January 8, 1957, in Joppa, Md. Since his childhood he dreamed of becoming a pilot. He spent 4 hard years studying at the U.S. Air Force Academy, and then went on for 1 year of pilot training at Lubbock, Tex. This was followed by 3 months of fighter lead-in training at Hollman Air Force Base in New Mexico and then he was introduced to the Phantom jet during 6 months of intensive training at Luke Air Force Base, Ariz. Finally, on June 24, 1981, he was assigned as an aircraft commander to the 336th Tactical Fighter Squadron, 4th Tactical Fighter Wing, at Goldsboro, N.C.

First Lieutenant Mattson combined a love for flying with his love for his country. Perhaps his dream of becoming a pilot can best be expressed through his favorite poem.

HIGH FLIGHT

Oh, I have slipped the surly bonds of earth
And danced the skies on laughter-silvered wings;
Sunward I've climbed, and joined the tumbling mirth
Of sun split clouds-and done a hundred things
You have not dreamed of-wheeled and soared and swung
High in the sunlit silence. Hovering there,
I've chased the shouting wind along, and flung
My eager craft through footless hills of air
Up, up the long delirious, burning blue
I've topped the windswept heights with easy grace
Where never lark, or even eagle flew.
And, while with silent, lifting mind I've trod
The high untrespassed sanctity of space,
Put out my hand, and touched the face of God.

—JOHN GILLESPIE MAGEE, JR.

Michael was on his way to compiling an outstanding career record. I had the highest respect for his character and motivation. He was of the material of which heroes are made, and as is the case with such men, his stay among us was far too brief. I, along with his comrades and the Nation share the tremendous sorrow and extend our heartfelt sympathy to his family: We are all the poorer for his loss. Although he may no longer be with us, a little of his spirit and courage will remain in everyone his life touched. His untiring devotion to duty did much to increase the strength of the United States and promote the cause of justice and order throughout the world. His zestful energy and undaunted determination to serve his Nation will be an enduring example to all brave men and women who will follow in his profession.

CBS REPORT ON SOUTHEAST ASIA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BAILEY) is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, something is dreadfully or terribly wrong at CBS. I had occasion last weekend to view the so-called CBS report on Southeast Asia. I guess it was in effect an attempt to try to dismiss out of hand the contention that General Westmoreland and others have made that the reason for that terrible policy failure had to do with something that happened here at home. It was an apparent thinly veiled attack or criticism of Westmoreland's remarks to that effect.

When I returned from overseas I had attended law school at Duquesne University in Pittsburgh at night, and as part of my studies I chose a seminar in political and civil rights. I wrote my thesis on press responsibility. The vast majority of the journalists in our country, I think, do try to adhere to some standard of responsibility and some degree of objectivity in the work that they do. As part of my studies, I had occasion to analyze a CBS white paper, "The Selling of the Pentagon." It was a very poor job, a very dishonest editing job that was done.

The reasons for the criticism were good. The questions that were raised were good. They were questions that should have been asked. The editing that was done, the way the material was treated, detracted from the credibility of that work. They also mocked the intent and the purpose of the first amendment and what it is for.

I have seen other CBS documentaries, "The Guns of Autumn." Walter Cronkite's response to "The Guns of Autumn" when CBS was threatened with a lawsuit over its content was that, "Mirrors don't lie." That is rather naive. It is also a little self-righteous, and I do not think it is a fair way to use the 6:30 news.

I do not know what happened with the so-called juggling of figures in Southeast Asia. I honestly do not know. I would be dishonest if I said to you that I would be very quick to accept the CBS interpretation of events or their so-called investigative work done on that project. I do not have that kind of confidence in CBS's ability to be objective. But, I really have to wonder whether or not the outcome, what the policy affected, would have been any different. Let us suppose that those figures were juggled. I do not think it would make that much difference. I do not think that in terms of the political or military alternatives available to this country at the time, we would have done anything differently.

Second, I think the show does a greater disservice. It does something to truth and thus history, and I guess this is what turns in my stomach when I watch the great power of a large network, and I have no ax to grind with them, for what seems like almost personal reasons, distort the facts through imbalanced presentation.

I have no particular complaint against the media but I do when I, as a consumer of news, am fed information by CBS that is so distorted or so biased that it offends the sense of truth that I think all of us respect and admire.

We are left with a number of innuendos when the show is over. All right, you have aspersions cast on the character of American military leaders. Well, questions like that should be raised, and those kinds of things should be investigated, but the major innuendo was that somehow Tet was a great military defeat. Well, it was, but it was not much of a military defeat for us, and even the most casual observers of the war, even the most amateur historians, will admit that from a military point of view—and we have interpretations, we have cables that were intercepted from North Vietnam that indicate that they themselves have viewed it as a disastrous military defeat for them.

But, it was a tremendous propaganda victory, and it really leaves open the question that the CBS documentary would leave with all of you in your minds because they do not have the courage to address it. They do not have the courage to say that this was a policy failure that was due to a lack of America's proper military prosecution of the war. Because they cannot support that hypothesis. However as Americans we have all got to admit, because this is the truth, we decided to make a decision that we did not want to spend the money or the blood to prosecute the war. So be it.

Let us abide by the opinions that force and form our policy here, that is, majority opinion. I do. I do not want to blame it on someone who is not responsible. The failure of this country to successfully prosecute the war in Southeast Asia was a horrendous policy mistake once we were involved and committed. We did not see it through. Let us have the guts as a country to admit that we collectively did not see it through.

It is absurd to assume that this Nation's military and personal and political and economic and cultural resources, properly applied, could not have militarily succeeded in producing a different outcome in Southeast Asia. We were outlasted, folks. That was the truth. Do not blame it on a bunch of soldiers. Do not accept the CBS position that wants to walk away from the responsibility and role they played in reporting a war, and perhaps getting a little big for their britches, and forgetting what words "perspective" and "balance" mean, consequently wish to distort reflections upon it.

I have no personal ax to grind with the news media. I have been treated very well at home. I have been treated fairly. But I have watched the series "60 Minutes," and this documentary, and other documentaries and I am waiting for the day that ABC or NBC will run a full-page ad in the New York Times or the Washington Post—and please, if they could just do it objectively—and in that ad say, "Folks, we are going to take a look at the writing of a CBS White Paper."

Maybe that is also, I would very gently suggest to my countrymen, a small part of the story, and that it is not going to be forgotten and its effects will not be washed away. They will not be expunged by trying to hang a badge on someone else and saying "see, if you had said something different, this would have turned out a different way."

Tet was a horrible military defeat for the other side. It was not perceived that way here. That is a shame.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman for bringing this very important point to the Members of the House. I also had the opportunity to watch the CBS series, and I was disappointed in the way that it was presented to the American public. In fact, the series turned me off when it said right off that America's defeat in Vietnam was not a military defeat.

I was over there eight different times during the war, and our flag was never dipped over there. When we left, we left and turned the war over to the South Vietnamese. I thought they could do the job. I thought they had had enough training.

Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman confirm a number of things? I would very much appreciate his help by asking a few questions. The gentleman is the chairman of our Veterans' Affairs Committee, and of course also serves on the Armed Services Committee, where he is obviously very experienced. The United States of America made a decision to leave Southeast Asia. At the time we left, as I understand it, the territorial integrity of South Vietnam was intact. Am I wrong?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will bear with me, is it not also true that when we left it was a matter of about 2 years, I think, before that country fell? There were a number of pitched battles, such as at An Loc. Even so, the news media reported that with little sympathy to the South. The gentleman knows that. Are those not facts? I am just curious. We were not driven from the country.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. We were out of Vietnam with all of our fighting forces 2 years before South Vietnam fell. There is no question about it, it was a political war. If we wanted to unleash our forces, in my humble opinion, within 2 or 3 weeks we could have overrun North Vietnam; we could have totally destroyed all the cities of North Vietnam.

But, my other point is, I do not think the series treated General Westmoreland fairly at all. I think he was, overall, one of our great commanders that we had. It was a difficult war to fight, and certainly one can go back and pick up things that did not go exactly right in any type of conflict we have been involved in. Nothing goes right in a war, as the gentleman knows. There are always some problems. You just cannot hit the target on the first shot.

Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania. I would add to that—and I fought there—I would have to add that while I think those enemy forces were nice, tough people, I had a lot more respect for those soldiers, I still bear no malice for those soldiers on the other side, of whom I had many opportunities to see die, a lot more respect for them than I do for our armchair philosophers.

I have got to be honest with you about that. But in a country like ours it is important that we be honest with ourselves as to what constitutes a policy failure so we can learn from it and improve in the future. Perhaps we never should have been involved. There is a debate whether the war was fought properly, but it should not be painted as something that it is not.

Anyone who thinks that any nation can carry on a war without the kind of political support to keep it going and to follow through with its objectives is being naive. Wars are not divided into military and political fronts. Wars are efforts. They are an ultimate form of human conflict. They are terribly bloody, they are horribly painful, they are terribly scarring, one war is all the terrible things that all wars are. But they are ultimate human endeavors that are not simply blamable on some mistake by a small group, of involved persons by a group of people who happen to enjoy a privileged access to the American people, and I think CBS is very much afraid of the hypocrisy that they have weaved in failing to address their own role that Westmoreland criticized.

I have talked to reporters who had their leads rewritten in Tokyo. I met a reporter in New York 2 weeks ago who spent 2½ years with one of the major networks who was very upset with the way his stories were handled.

I do not want to blame it on the news media. That is not fair also. The failure stemmed from a multititude of things, but I think that media distortion was part of it. As to William Westmoreland and the figures on Tet and the infiltration, it is just patently asinine to say that that's the reason for failure. To do so is to grossly exaggerate.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I think one of the problems that brought our commanders into this picture and why CBS did this, it seemed to me that there was some type of argument or hard feelings between the CIA and the DIA during the war. That is what came out to me in watching the CBS show.

Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will allow me to point this out, my interpretation, plainly and simply, with the way it was left and the way Mike Wallace left it, was that Westmoreland had made references to the war being lost here at home. Given the military job that was done and given the military objectives, I would have to say that I agree with that contention.

I think by and large, militarily, where we went, where we had to go and with the military goals we needed to achieve, we did achieve our objectives. I do not think there is any doubt about that. Tet would have happened 6 months later and Tet would have happened again if we had done the same things. But they did not and they could not, because they got their behinds whipped.

So let us not blame that on the soldiers and the commanders who went to do a job that they believed was right.

Essentially, the reason why I think CBS did that—and this innuendo was left at the end of the show—was because Westmoreland had had the incredible gall—can we imagine it—to suggest that perhaps there was a number of different factors involved, many of them political, here in the United States, including this Congress, that led to that political reversal, which it clearly was.

I mean we started out with an objective and we left in the middle of it. That is what we did. We did not get booted out. We walked away. Maybe we Americans do not like to admit that we walked away, but that is what we did. That is the truth. We cannot blame it on anybody. We cannot blame it on General Westmoreland, and I do not want to blame this on CBS. But CBS has a responsibility to be balanced, and I do not think they are.

I think General Westmoreland touched a nerve, I say to the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. MONTGOMERY). I think he touched a nerve, and I think it hurts. I think it pinches a little bit.

When you bring out a "sacred cow" like Walter Cronkite, who can predict what happens, but whom no one can and when you maintain that question one has to wonder about the reason for the show. I think they are getting too big for their britches. Naturally, it is not my role to interfere with them, but I hope the media in this country appreciates this because the Nation depends on objectivity and the freedom of the press. To abuse that freedom is to abuse us all and Government is not the only abuser.

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LUNGREN. Mr. Speaker, I just want to thank the gentleman for bringing this matter to the attention of this body, not to argue about the way we prosecuted the war but in an effort to try to get away from what I see to be a continuing effort to somehow condemn those people who served as simple soldiers in that war as failures.

We have constantly seen them painted, in story after story on television, and in the print media, and so forth, in terms that they came back as terrible failures. They are painted as social failures, and now by the rewriting of history they want to make sure that everybody understands they were failures as soldiers.

As everybody knows, we lost the Tet offensive, but the gentleman stated correctly in fact that it was not a military defeat for the United States. We were successful. Unfortunately, that was not the interpretation back here, and to the extent we can make sure the Vietnam war veteran does not suffer from these misstatements and misconceptions of the role he played, I think we have an obligation to do that.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for adding to that effort a restoration of the facts and the reality of what occurred from what we have seen over the past few years.

Mr. BAILEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from California (Mr. LUNGREN).

LEGISLATION TO AID IN RESOLVING WHOLESALE ELECTRIC RATE CASES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. CORCORAN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. CORCORAN. Mr. Speaker, as was the case a year ago, there is a substantial backlog of wholesale electric rate increase applications pending at the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, and today, as I did on December 3, 1980, I am introducing legislation that I believe would help the Commission more promptly resolve wholesale electric rate cases.

Delays in taking final action on these applications often permits rates which may be unjustifiable to take effect. In some instances, a contested rate becomes effective while one or more other challenged rate increases have already been allowed to take effect; this "pancaking" can compound the degree to which rates electric consumers pay are different from what the Commission finally determines to be fair.

Commonwealth Edison has proposed an electric rate increase for cities which purchase power at wholesale in its service area in Illinois—Batavia, Geneva, St. Charles, Naperville, Rock Falls, and Rochelle. This could take effect before two previous applications for increases by ComEd and affecting these cities, now pending at the Commission, are resolved. Another increase is encompassed in a lawsuit now before the Court of Appeals—D.C. Circuit. Obviously, should delays in taking final action be reduced, electric consumers served by municipal wholesale purchasers of power would not find themselves in this unfortunate situation.

The proposed "Wholesale Electric Rate Fairness Act," which I am again introducing, comprises two statutory changes suggested by former Commission Chairman Charles B. Curtis in his January 1980 report, "Decisional Delay in Wholesale Electric Rate Increase Cases: Causes, Consequences and Possible Remedies," submitted to Congress pursuant to the Public Utility Regulatory Policy Act of 1978. One change would allow a decision on whether to postpone the rate increase for up to 5 months to be made by one commissioner or a senior FERC official rather than by the full Commission. Under a second provision of the bill, those challenging rate increases could more quickly appeal decisions in the court system, bypassing a time-consuming rehearing of the case by the Commission. These changes would likely relieve the Commission of scores of agenda items each year, giving it more time to work on decisions of greater significance, including rulings on rate fairness. Further discussion of the provisions of this legislation, along with its text, can be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 3, 1980, at page 32079.

Mr. Speaker, the wholesale electric rate case backlog has been growing. At the end of fiscal year 1979, there were 248 cases under part II of the Federal Power Act pending, most of which involve wholesale electric rates. There were 281 pending at the end of fiscal year 1980 and 312 when the 1981 fiscal year concluded. It is my hope that Congress will examine this circumstance and take action to reduce delays in resolving contested rate increase applications. The legislation I am introducing today is one means by which we can afford consumers a greater degree of fairness in the process of determining wholesale electric rates.●

COMMITTEE STAFF

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. COLLINS) is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. COLLINS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, under the courageous leadership of President Reagan, we are seeing a renewed spirit and hope in the country. Cuts were made in our oversized Federal budget. I believe, it is now time for sacrifice at home. How can we justify cuts in the bureaucracy while Congress is padding its own halls with overloaded committee staff at the expense of all American taxpayers?

Let me say that congressional statutory staff should remain the same as it is right now. Let us keep these 30 people which most House Committees are allowed, but let us reduce the additional investigative staff. These investigative staff are simply political appointees hired by the Chairman and not the committee's full membership. They are not employed under civil service, very few are allotted to the minority, and have no required or uniform qualifications. Let us look at the enormous growth of these staff during the last decade. This growth is a startling example of an inflated bureaucracy.

In 1973, congressional investigative staff numbered 570. In only 7 years, this number zoomed up to 1,161. At this rate, by the year 2000, we would have approximately 9,000 people compared to the 570 just a few years ago. Imagine the cost to the taxpayer.

These staff salaries cost money. Their salaries are provided by annual funding resolutions passed by the House. These salary levels have grown tremendously. In 1971, the total committee budget which includes the investigative staff, was $6,800,000. By 1980, this budget skyrocketed to $43,602,118. Some of the committees with the most blatant growth are Energy and Commerce, with investigative funding of $1,474,000 in the 92d Congress which rose to $7,458,000 by the 96th; Merchant Marine which zoomed from $519,000 in the 92d to $3,176,245 in the 96th; and during the same period of time, the Agriculture Committee mushroomed from $250,000 to $2,272,000. The Rules Committee which only needed $5,000 in the 92d Congress exploded to the astronomical figure of $1,134,000 in the 96th.

This stafflation received the attention of many Members last year, including 52 new freshman Republicans. But, as support for reducing the committee funding resolutions was mounting, the leadership got scared of possible defeat. The Rules Committee passed what was later called the "gag rule". What this did was to combine all committee funding requests into one resolution in order to protect the committees, because most of their budgets could not stand up to close scrutiny. A careful review and debate of each committee's resolution individually by the House would have allowed many budgets to go down to defeat.

The House mandated this unfair approach of combining all budgets into one resolution. The resolution provided a 10 percent reduction in the 1981 authorizations level over 1980 authorizations. This sounds fine, but in reality, it was an increase in authorizations of 6 percent over the 1980 expenditures. It boils down to an illusionary savings—we are not spending less of the taxpayers' money as it would appear—we are spending more. Authorization is not the bottom line. The appropriation is not cut, and the spending goes on.

Last year we had tremendous support from the Committee on House Administration which voluntarily cut its 1981 budget by 20 percent from 1980 expenditures. This was a constructive step toward reducing the burden of the Federal Government on all citizens. As committee staffs grow, the amount of work increases without necessarily increasing the effectiveness or efficiency in order to justify new staff jobs. I hope that many other committees follow the example set by House Administration last year.

Soon the process begins again. The Nation is watching to see how we, the Congress, set the example for fiscal restraint and responsibility. We cannot better serve the President and his program than by cutting back our own oversized and expensive investigative committees.

We are all appreciative of the hard working and efficient House Administration Committee. The gentleman from California (Mr. HAWKINS) chairs the committee. Mr. FRENZEL of Minnesota is the ranking member. The subcommittee handling the funding budgets is chaired by Mr. ANNUNZIO of Illinois with ranking member Mr. BADHAM of California. Remember, they cut their committee staff budget last year. Lets all join in more cuts.

OVERSIGHT HEARING SET ON COAL DEATHS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GAYDOS) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, the Subcommittee on Health and Safety, which I chair, will conduct oversight hearings into the series of tragedies that have killed at least 40 coal miners since the budget cuts went into effect for the Mine Safety and Health Administration.

The first hearing will be held on Tuesday, February 23, 1982, in room 2261 of the Rayburn Building.●

KING CRIME

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ) is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise again at the outset of the 2d session of the 97th Congress, as I have since the last Congress in the very beginning, with respect to the matter of what I call King Crime's continued reign unchallenged in our country, the murder or death of Federal Judge John W. Wood, and the prior attempts on the life of the assistant district attorney for the Federal western district. This is the then assistant whose life was almost taken in an outright attack on him prior to the death of Judge Wood.

In May it will be 3 years since Judge Wood was assassinated. Since then I have risen time after time in this forum after it was apparent that no progress was being made in the successful resolution of that case leading to the apprehension, arrest, and conviction of those culpable of these very dastardly crimes. I was impelled to do so because it was obvious I should since this happened in the environs—not within my district but in the environs of my district, what used to be the district at one time, the 20th Congressional District which I happen to have the privilege of representing at this time and which included the entirety of Bexar County. Today it is the inner portion of the City of San Antonio. And these crimes were committed in one of the most sophisticated, affluent suburbs not only in Texas but anywhere in the country.

There was no question that both crimes, the attempt on the assistant Federal district attorney first, and then the successful attempt on Judge Wood were one and the same part of a planned operation. I do not think there is any question and nobody debates that it was a very sophisticated form of organized crime that was actually responsible.

But the main thing that impelled me and continues to impel me to bring this before the House of Representatives as a national issue is that it is the first overt, direct attempt on the third branch of our Government, the judiciary, in what is obvious to me to be an attempt to intimidate and coerce that branch of Government. The sad part is that no more progress has been made in resolving that crime today, almost 3 years later, than there was when I first rose to speak here at the opening of the last Congress after the attack on the assistant district attorney, James W. Kerr.

This is so insidious, and it is such a challenge, particularly to the policymaking body of this country. After all, under the Constitution, if there is one of the three co-equal branches of the Government that is perhaps more dependent on another branch such as this, the first branch, it is the judiciary because, after all, the Constitution provides for the Congress to set up and give the framework of reference, the meat and veins and life to the skeleton known as the judiciary system.

What I am saying is that this is the first direct attack of this nature. It is the first crime of this type in the history of the American judiciary.

What I am further saying is that it further shows the absolute imperviousness of organized crime to any kind of minimal control by our law enforcement agencies, either on the national, State, or local level, and particularly the national level where I have been speaking out since 1970, and have been speaking out because the very, very able and sophisticated forms of this crime have been so successful that they have penetrated the highest levels of our Government. There would not be the pattern of crime such as is besetting us today if we did not have some kind of an intimate connection between crime and business and the political branch all the way from the national down to the lowest level. If we did not have this intricate relationship, we would not have the horrendous control that

King Crime has undaunted over our society at this time.

I have said repeatedly that I have foresworn to continue this until there is some revelation of direct concern on the part of this body. I have introduced a resolution which has received little or no support. I still believe it is as needed today as the day I introduced it. That resolution merely expressed the sense of the House of Representatives that it is our wish and sense that the President allocate out of the resources appropriated by the Congress to the Justice Department an amount not to exceed $3 million for a reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those responsible for the attacks on James Kerr and the murder of Judge Wood.

I have been laughed at, ridiculed, except by the knowledgeable people in law enforcement and some of those with whom I have had a great, happy association through the years since I myself was involved in law enforcement many, many years ago. At first glance it does look as if perhaps there would be no cause and effect, but the truth of the matter is that even the meager attempts to resolve the case, at least superficially, which have led to spasmodic, big headlines involving first the formation of a special grand jury, which was not formed until after I had raised my voice and gotten a little bit of reaction here, obtained an audience with the President's domestic adviser and representatives from the Drug Enforcement Agency and from the Justice Department, but we never did get the national, concerted level action that these crimes deserve and demand as a matter of priority.

I have said that I would not stand idly by and see this crime fade into the dust of history to be forgotten, very much like the disappearance of Jimmy Hoffa. I do not think anybody in or out of officialdom says that Jimmy Hoffa's disappearance was anything but a crime and that he was murdered, though the body has not even been found. There is nobody who contradicts the out-and-out allegation that organized crime was responsible for that one.

In the case of Judge Wood and in the case of the attempt on James Kerr, even the most cynical of law enforcement agents will agree that it was a very well prepared and highly planned act in both cases. In fact, so well prepared that only a few cases have been made, and, as I say and repeat, in each instance it was with great alarums, in fact too much publicity, and perhaps it is understandable because the law enforcement agents and the prosecutoral agents are on the defensive, and they have been desperate. In fact, I think that they exceeded themselves in getting the type of publicity on a couple of occasions, that they have. I think they have endangered any possibility of real successful prosecution. But what has been unobtainable and, again, with great ado, has been convictions. First it was assumed, and it was publicized that it was some of these known as the gangs on the motorcycles, the bandidos. Then that faded and in the last year we had great publicity about prosecutions of a man and then his wife, and even in jurisdictions outside of it on a change of venue of the scene of the crime. But even at best they have been accused not as accomplices in the crime or perpetrators of the crime, but with some subsidiary charges such as having bought illegal weapons. Even the weapons have not been susceptible of being proved as associated with the commission of the crimes.

So what we mean is that we are ending up at square one as of 2½ years ago, to the great detriment of the national interests, in my opinion. Today I am merely reaffirming my intention to keep on as best as one man can to keep attention on this crime with everything within my individual power to see that it leads eventually to a resolution. I think that the destiny of this country is symbolized in the matter of the successful resolution of this type of crime.

As I say, it has unprecedented features, and for that reason I am convinced that it has more than local or sectional but, rather, national importance, and should have national priority. That is the main impelling motivation behind my taking the time of my colleagues in this body.

I will add that it is disturbing that rather than acting either on the budget or any other of the collateral actions of this last year, rather than helping to shore up the agencies—without whose shoring up these crimes will not be resolved but, rather, the other way around—we have, in effect, wittingly or unwittingly, added to the disintegration, at least in the funding, of the viable agencies that must be at work. In fact, my impulse has been to try to add, not detract, as a matter of priority, so that at last our legally constituted authorities will at least have a chance when they confront this giant known as King Crime.

I can see why it is impossible until we break the stranglehold and this tremendous interlocking of the interests between the political, the business, and organized crime. There is no question that organized crime has penetrated every level of business endeavor in this country from motels to franchise dealers, you name it. In fact, I also correlated one of the initial causes leading to the death of Judge Wood as the tremendous burgeoning trade, the illicit trade, in the international stolen car market that mushroomed in a matter of less than 1 year from a few-hundred-million-dollar thing to over a $3 billion business today, mostly into Mexico in exchange for drugs that have not been at all either curbed or reduced in their introduction into our country.

So, Mr. Speaker, I am hopeful that somehow, in some way, I can get the attention of my colleagues and pass the resolution. After all, we are not appropriating money; we are expressing that it is the sense of this House that this demands this kind of priority. Then it is up to the executive branch to use its judgment as to whether it wants to give these crimes the priority they merit.

I yield back the balance of my time.

THE 1982 ELECTION YEAR MAILING RESTRICTIONS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, with the 1982 election year rapidly approaching, the House Commission on Congressional Mailing Standards wishes to remind Members of the House of the franking statutes, rules, and regulations governing mass mailings by candidates prior to elections.

Generally, Members of the House seeking reelection are prohibited from sending franked mass mailings during the 60-day period immediately before the date of any public election—whether primary, general, special, or runoff—in which such Member's name appears on the ballot.

Further, any Member who is a candidate for other public office may not frank mass mailings outside of the congressional district from which the Member was elected, beginning at the time the Member is certified for candidacy.

Members should insure that staff persons responsible for mass mailings are knowledgeable of State election laws as they affect mailing privileges during the period prior to primary and general election periods. Members' staff seeking advisory opinions from the Commission must certify that, to the best of their knowledge, the frankability of the proposed mailing is not adversely affected by applicable State election law.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot emphasize strongly enough the importance of compliance with these regulations. I urge my colleagues to assure that their staffs are familiar with the statutes, Rules of the House, and pertinent regulations and guidelines governing the proper use of the franking privilege.

The Commission staff is ready to assist in every possible way.

A detailed explanation of the mass mailing provisions, along with a listing of cutoff dates for the congressional primaries in the various States, follows:

LIMITATIONS ON THE USE OF THE FRANK BY CANDIDATES FOR PUBLIC OFFICE

39 U.S.C. 3210 (a)(6)(A) provides that, "It is the intent of Congress that a Member of, or Member-elect to, Congress may not mail any mass mailing as franked mail—

(i) if the mass mailing is mailed fewer than 60 days immediately before the date of any primary election or general election (whether regular, special or runoff) in which the Member is a candidate for re-election; or

(ii) in the case of a Member of, or Member-elect to, the House who is a candidate for any other public office, if the mass mailing—

(I) is prepared for delivery within any portion of the jurisdiction of or the area covered by the public office which is outside the area constituting the congressional district from which the Member or Member-elect was elected; or

(II) is mailed fewer than 60 days immediately before the date of any primary election or general election (whether regular, special or runoff) in which the Member-elect is a candidate for any other public office.

Mailings made through the facilities of the House Distribution Service (Folding Room) shall be deemed in compliance with this statute if such mailings are delivered to the House Folding Room not less than 62 days before the date of such election, with instructions for immediate dispatch.

DEFINITIONS

Mass mailings

Mass mailings are defined by law [39 U.S.C. 3210(a)(5)(D)] as newsletters and other similar mailings of more than 500 pieces in which the content of the matter mailed is substantially identical. Mail matter is deemed to be a mass mailing when the total number of pieces exceeds 500, whether in a single mailing or in cumulative mailings during the 60-day period.

Candidate for election or reelection to the House of Representatives

For purposes of the subject statutes and regulations, a Member of or a Member-elect to the House of Representatives is deemed to be a candidate for public office at any election if his or her name appears anywhere on any official ballot to be used in a public election.

Candidate for "any other public office"

For the purpose of 39 U.S.C. 3210(a)(6)(A)(ii), "any other public office" means any State or Federal office, other than a U.S. Representative at Large for which the candidate would be elected by a majority of votes cast. (Examples: President, Governor, U.S. Senator, State Supreme Court Justice, State Senator at Large, Assemblyman at Large, Mayor, etc.) "Candidate" means a Member who has qualified under State law, for the official ballot in a primary, runoff, special, or general election, or who has been certified for candidacy by an appropriate State election official.

EXCEPTIONS

The subject statutes, rules, and regulations provide three exceptions to the mass mail prohibition prior to elections, as follows:

(i) (mailings) which are in direct response to inquiries or requests from the persons to whom the matter is mailed;

(ii) (mailings) to colleagues in Congress or to government officials (whether Federal, State, or local); and

(iii) (mailings) of news releases to the communications media.

The Commission believes the last two exceptions are self-explanatory.

In application of the first exception, the Commission stresses the phrase "direct response to inquiries or requests". Therefore, response to a signed petition with a form or identical letter individually addressed to each of the signers of the petition is frankable. However, a follow-up letter to the same list of petitioners is not frankable under this section in that it would not be in direct response to an inquiry.

Similarly, follow-up letters to persons who had previously written and had been answered on a particular subject, if such letters by their form and volume constitute a mass mailing, are not frankable during the 60-day period prior to elections. Also, requests for questionnaire results or other material, when solicited by Members on questionnaire forms or newsletters, are not deemed to be in direct response to any inquiry or request.

The above restrictions on mass mailings by candidates do not apply to mass mailings by the chairman of any standing, select, joint or other official committee of the Congress, or subcommittee thereof, and which relate to the normal business of the committee. [39 U.S.C. 3210(a)(6)(B)]

TIME OF MAILING

Processing by a postal facility

Mass mailings as defined under 39 U.S.C. 3210(a)(5)(D), may not be mailed as franked mail by a Member of or a Member-elect to the House of Representatives when the same is mailed at or delivered to any postal facility other than the Publications Distribution Service of the House of Representatives, hereinafter referred to as the House folding room, less than 60 days immediately before the date of any primary or general election (whether regular, special, or runoff) in which such Member or Member-elect is a candidate for any public office.

Processing by the House folding room

Such mass mailings, if processed through the House folding room, shall be deemed to be in compliance with the subject rule and these regulations, if delivered to the House folding room, with instructions for immediate dispatch, not less than 62 days immediately before the date of any such election. In the case of mass mailings delivered to the House folding room prior to the 62-day cutoff period, the requirement of instructions for "immediate dispatch" may be modified to the extent that instructions are given for delivery of the mailing to the addressee not later than the 60th day immediately before the date of such election.

The House folding room shall issue a receipt, which shall specify the date and time of delivery and a brief description of the matter to be processed, to the Member at the time he or she delivers such mass mailings to the House folding room.

FEDERALISM

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. LEVITAS) is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, today I am going to continue a discussion that I began last fall on a subject which was the centerpiece of President Reagan's state of the Union address last night. I began to discuss the matter of federalism as an important issue that faces this Nation in very specific terms during the last months of 1981.

I did so, Mr. Speaker, because for many years, I have been a very strong believer in the concept of federalism and the need for its renewal and its reinvigoration in this Nation. Indeed, the single most important contribution to political institutions which the United States has given birth to is the sense of federalism, is the concept and the constitutional doctrine of federalism.

The concept of federalism was given new life a number of years ago by those decisions of the courts calling for the reapportionment of State legislative bodies to make them more representative and more responsive to the needs of the people.

□ 1630

As a result of the emergence of strong and representative State governments, we were once again able to reestablish the importance and the viability of State and local government.

I think most Americans believe that there is no more wisdom, no more integrity, no more efficiency in Washington, to say the very least, than there is in those State capitals or city halls and county commission courthouses around the Nation. Indeed, there is a very strong feeling that government closest to the problem, as well as closest to the people, is best equipped to make the proper response to the needs that people have in those areas and with respect to those issues and problems which are not, by their inherent nature, national in scope.

President Reagan said last night—and I think quite well—that it is a very sad situation to find that most people today, most citizens today, are concerned that they have to go to Washington rather than to their State or local governments to get decisions about essential services of government, such as schools, welfare, and even garbage collection.

I think the President, in that sense, was absolutely right. And over the last several years—not just beginning this last year, but over the last several years—there has been a redirection of more responsibility, more decisionmaking to the State governments.

But what began to concern me last year, as I listened to spokesmen for the administration outline their concept of federalism, what they called "new federalism," it occurred to me that there was something perhaps missing and something lurking that could even be harmful and dangerous, and that was not simply a return of appropriate responsibilities to local and State government, but simply a shifting of tax burdens back to citizens and back to their State and local governments. If federalism is no more than shifting taxes back to other layers of government, we have not achieved a great deal. We certainly have not reduced the tax burden on the backs of the American people. We have just made that burden payable to a different tax collector.

My concerns were, unfortunately, confirmed during hearings which our Subcommittee on Intergovernmental Relations had last year on the subject of federalism. We requested that the administration send over a spokesman to present this administration's concept and understanding of new federalism. And that spokesman was the Secretary of the Interior, James Watt, designated by the administration to explain their sense of new federalism. During the course of questioning of Secretary Watt, I asked him the question, after listening to his explanation, and he said, in response to my question—and it is a matter of record—that, yes, federalism means raising local property taxes. That is what it means. Later, just a few weeks later, the Under Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Norman Ture, speaking on behalf of the administration, went even further, and he said that there were going to be no new resources provided for State and local governments to meet these new responsibilities, except, he said, the tax reduction which Congress voted for the American taxpayers last year.

Now, I supported that tax reduction, Mr. Speaker, because I believe that Americans are just as able or better able, to make decisions about how to spend or save their money than Federal bureaucrats. I believe that the purpose of that tax cut, Mr. Speaker, was for the purpose of either relieving the tax burden on the backs of the American people or to provide the investments and the savings necessary to spur productivity in the American economy. And yet if those tax reduction funds are not going to be available for the purpose of providing tax relief or providing savings and investment in the private sector, because they are going to get sucked up by increased local taxes, as spokesmen for the Reagan administration have advocated, then it makes a mockery out of the tax cut and assures the failure of its purpose.

Last night, as I heard the explanation for the first time of this new federalism program, I again began to wonder: Is it really new federalism? Or is it, rather, what I describe as "neo-new federalism," which simply means raising taxes on the backs of State and local taxpayers who, by the way, are the same people who pay Federal taxes. And as I analyzed the speech last night, my concerns grew.

The President in his speech last night said, and I quote:

> Let us solve this problem with a single bold stroke—the return of some $47 billion in Federal programs to State and local government, together with the means to finance them and a transition period of nearly 10 years to avoid unnecessary disruption.

So there we heard about the return of $47 billion in costs to your State and to your local governments.

And then I waited to hear where the return of resources was coming from. About two pages later, in the speech, the President said, and I quote again:

> In 1984, the Federal Government will apply the full proceeds from certain excise taxes to a grassroots trust fund that will belong, in fair shares, to the 50 States. The total amount flowing into this fund will be $28 billion a year.

Now, simple arithmetic tells me that between $47 billion of additional costs and $28 billion of additional resources, there is a $19 billion gap that is going to come out of the hides and the pockets of Americans through payments of State and local taxes.

Neo-new federalism will not mean a reduction of taxes. It will simply mean shifting the envelope that you send your tax check in, instead of to the Internal Revenue Collector at the Federal level, to your State and local tax collectors.

But even more, as I began to analyze some of the areas of return responsibility without resources, I began to find out that there are some areas in which people back home, people in our communities, are going to feel the full brunt of the neo-new federalism.

The Subcommittee on Investigations and Oversight, which I chair, has responsibilities for, among other things, the water pollution control program. Last year we analyzed the impact of the return of these responsibilities to State and local governments under the proposed legislation which the administration introduced. And we went out to different places around the country and asked questions. In one particular hearing that we had in Austin, Tex., where we heard officials from a number of communities throughout that State, where we heard testimony from members of chambers of commerce and other groups, we found out that neo-new federalism, in returning responsibilities without returning resources, would result in great increases on water bills in the State of Texas. In those communities which testified, the range of increase was from 60 to 300 percent.

Now, it is very difficult to explain to a person how they have saved any money in a tax reduction if they are going to have to pay it out in higher sales taxes, higher property taxes, higher State income taxes, and higher water and sewer bills around the country.

The President, in his program, has even discussed reducing drastically Federal revenue sharing. Federal revenue-sharing was a means by which local property taxes could be kept down. The reduction or elimination of this program will have only one consequence, and that is raising local taxes. That is neo-new federalism. It is not just a matter of placing responsibility where it ought to be, in my opinion, but it must also be accompanied by the resources which will provide the ability of State and local governments to meet these needs and discharge these responsibilities without raising the regressive taxes that we face at the State and local levels.

Mr. Speaker, the explanations we have thus far heard of this program are not the final word, and I am prepared to give the administration a chance to present its program in full. There are a lot of unanswered questions. There are some things which the President indicated in the state of the Union message on federalism that have great merit. I am pleased to note that they have adopted in their program a concept which I advocated; in fact, I sponsored an amendment which was enacted into law several years ago in the general revenue-sharing legislation, which said that States, in order to receive their revenue-sharing portion, could opt to pay back or forgo categorical programs and thereby receive revenue sharing. They could spend the general revenue-sharing moneys at their discretion—where their priorities were, where the needs which they identified were. And, these expenditures could be administered better at the local and State levels than they could be at the Federal level. This concept, I see with a great deal of satisfaction, is included in the administration's program. But, Mr. Speaker, I think we have got to be extremely careful as we look at the concept of federalism or new federalism to make certain that it becomes something more than neo-new federalism, which is a back-door way, indeed, perhaps, almost a dishonest way, of raising taxes on the American people on the one hand, when they had been promised tax relief and tax reduction on the other hand. I think we are going to have to take a very hard, long, constructive, and cooperative look at the new federalism program to assure that it becomes something more than neo-new federalism—and thus far, those signals in that program have not been sent.

I am hoping, as the administration develops this program, that it becomes something more than a sham of an offer of returning responsibilities back to State and local officials, and that it becomes a real meaningful program so that these types of problems which are best dealt with in the city hall, in the county commission, and in the State legislature can be dealt with there.

I hope this becomes a meaningful program and not simply a sham to raise taxes collected by other levels of government or to dismantle programs that have served the people of this Nation well.

And so, Mr. Speaker, as we look forward to the days ahead during the second session of the 97th Congress, I once again raise this cautionary word about federalism: We need federalism; we need to place more responsibility in our State governments and in our local governments. But we better do it honestly and we better do it rationally and not simply tell the people one thing and do something else.

When people get their tax bills this year and next year from their State governments and their local governments and begin to get their water and sewer bills from their local authorities, they are going to ask the question: Where did this come from? And I think the question better be one that Members of this House can answer honestly when they go back.

Mr. Speaker, as one Member of this House, I intend to work cooperatively with the administration in developing a real program of new federalism and work just as hard to defeat efforts to bring about a neo-new federalism, which is nothing more than a sham.

COMPREHENSIVE REFORM OF FORFEITURE LAWS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. HUGHES) is recognized for 15 minutes.

● Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a comprehensive reform of the forfeiture laws. The bill I have developed is the result of a thorough examination of the problems confronted by prosecutors in their attempts to take the profits out of drug dealing.

One of the single most important crime problems confronting this country is phenomenal increase in drug trafficking in recent years. We are now faced with a situation where drug dealers have been able to amass huge fortunes as as result of their illegal activities. The sad truth is that the financial penalties for drug dealing are frequently only seen by dealers as a cost of doing business. Under current law the maximum fine for many serious drug offenses is only $25,000. Moreover, the Government's ability to obtain civil or criminal forfeiture of the profits or proceeds of drug dealing has been hampered by statutory deficiencies. This bill attempts to address these problems in a manner that will encourage the immediate and effective utilization of these new tools by law enforcement.

At the outset I must acknowledge the material assistance I have received in this undertaking from my Congressional colleagues on both sides of the aisle. Senators JOSEPH BIDEN and SAM NUNN both have diligently pursued investigations of the problems with drug prosecutions. As a result of work done in the Senate Judiciary Committee and the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of the Senate Committee on Government Affairs, the area of forfeiture has emerged as a primary concern on the Federal law enforcement community.

At the suggestion of Senator BIDEN, the General Accounting Office did a ground breaking study of the problems in disgorging the profits of drug dealers. See, "Asset Forfeiture—A Seldom Used Tool in Combatting Drug Trafficking," GGD-81-5 (April 10, 1981). The Subcommittee on Crime, which I chair, followed up on the GAO report with a hearing on forfeiture during the first session of this Congress. At our first hearing we were able to review the bills of my colleagues HAL SAWYER, LEO ZEFERETTI, and BEN GILMAN (H.R. 2646, H.R. 4110, and H.R. 2910, respectively). Each of these gentlemen presented the subcommittee with innovative options on the reform of our forfeiture laws. The bill I am introducing today is the direct descendant of the bills they introduced earlier in this Congress.

An overview of the problems with the current forfeiture statutes by Government officials produces a clear consensus about the need for change. What is less clear is the path to achieve that reform. Most observers agree that prosecutors face three major problems: Ambiguous statutes, problems in tracing the proceeds of drug trafficking, and difficulties in proof. The solutions to these dilemmas are numerous and pursuit of them can often create a divergence of views. For example, while it may be desirable to ease Government seizure of property involving drug trafficking, one must also be careful to protect the rights of innocent third parties. Frequently, it is these conflicting values that produce different opinions about the wisdom of particular legislative reforms.

In the legislation I am introducing today I have attempted to balance the strong societal interest in eradicating trafficking in illegal drugs with the constitutional rights of our citizens. I am satisfied that a proper balance has been struck, I look forward to hearing the assessments of interested parties on this bill. Anyone with views on this legislation should communicate directly with me or through the Subcommittee on Crime, Committee on the Judiciary, 207 Cannon House Office Building, Washington, D.C. 20515 or telephone (202) 225-1695. The Subcommittee on Crime will hold hearings on this bill early in the second session. Anyone wishing to testify should contact the subcommittee.

BRIEF DESCRIPTION OF THE COMPREHENSIVE DRUG PENALTY ACT OF 1981

This bill makes numerous changes in the substantive law of forfeiture. In addition, the bill makes numerous procedural changes in the methods of handling forfeiture cases. Finally, the bill increases the maximum fine penalties for drug offenses. The increased use of forfeiture and criminal fines will be an important first step in the diminution of drug trafficking in the United States. A sectional analysis of the bill follows:

SECTION BY SECTION DESCRIPTION

Section 1: Contains the short title of the bill; "Comprehensive Drug Penalty Act of 1981."

Section 2: Amends section 1963 of title 18 in two major ways. This section in current law contains the authorization for criminal forfeiture in cases under the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970 (so-called RICO cases). Under current law the courts have consistently held that the Congress did not intend to authorize the criminal forefeiture of the profits or proceeds of an enterprise acquired or maintained through racketeering activity. See United States v. Marubeni American Corporation, 611 F.2d 763 (9th Cir. 1980); United States v. Mannino, 480 F. Supp. 1182 (S.D.N.Y. 1980), aff'd on other grounds, 635 F.2d 110, 118 (2nd Cir. 1980); United States v. Thevis, 474 F. Supp. 134 (N.D. Ga. 1979). This section authorizes the government to seek criminal forfeiture of profits or proceeds in two new instances.

First, 18 U.S.C. 1963 is amended to reach the profits or proceeds of persons involved in racketeering activities consisting of certain narcotics or dangerous drug offenses. The net result of this amendment will be to make it parallel with 21 U.S.C. 881 (which authorizes civil forfeiture of such property). The second part of this section of the bill allows the government to seek criminal forfeiture of the profits or proceeds of an enterprise engaged in illegal activities insofar as they are derived from an interest, security, claim or right in such enterprise when that interest, security, claim or right was previously acquired or maintained through racketeering activity. The net result of this amendment would be to accommodate the result sought in proposed section 1963(c) of H.R. 4110, without overturning the result in Marubeni American Corp. with respect to legitimate businesses.

Section 3: Amends section 1963(c) by establishing a procedure for the seizure and disposition of property subject to criminal forfeiture. The provisions are modelled after sections 8101-03 of H.R. 6915, approved by the Committee last Congress. See H. Rept. 96-1396, pages 575-579.

This section authorizes the court to take into account the rights of alleged innocent third parties. Under current law such persons are without effective opportunity for judicial review of forfeiture decisions. For example, in United States v. L'Hoste, 609 F.2d 796 (5th Cir.) cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1165 (1980) the Fifth Circuit held that once property has been determined to have been involved in the racketeering activity, innocent third parties must petition the Attorney General for equitable relief. The inadequacy of current law is further highlighted by the last episode from the Marvin Mandel case. In that case it took nearly five years after the criminal trial before an innocent third party obtained limited judicial review. United States v. Mandel, 505 F.2d 189 (D.Md. 1981).

Thus, this section provides a mechanism for judicial review of forfeiture actions insofar as they affect allegedly innocent third parties. Inclusion of this procedure is in response to the suggestions of the General Accounting Office and the Department of Justice. See General Accounting Office, "Asset Forfeiture," GGD-81-51, April 10, 1981, at 36-38, and 79.

The section envisions three ways that the government could obtain property subject to forfeiture. First, the government could obtain a court order if they established probable cause to believe that the property to be seized is subject to forfeiture. See O'Reilly v. United States, 486 F2d 208 (8th Cir. 1973) (a warrant is required for a seizure under 21 U.S.C. 881(b).) Second, it could seize property incident to an arrest so long as the seizure meets other constitutional standards. See generally "Note: The Forfeiture Exception to the Warrant Requirement," 67 Virg. L. Rev. 1035 (1981); See also United States v. Pappas, 613 F. 2d 324 (1st Cir. 1980) (a seizure warrant is required for property found in a public place.) Third, the government could obtain custody of the property through some other means such as abandonment or tax seizures and the like. Once the property is in custody of the government the trier of fact may order the property forfeited if the government meets its burden by establishing by a preponderance of the evidence that such property is forfeitable. Under current law the courts have read the existing criminal forfeiture procedures as requiring that the government establish its forfeiture claims beyond a reasonable doubt.

This reading by the courts does not appear to be required as a matter of constitutional law. Rather, the courts have merely misconstrued the initial Congressional intent in the 1970 Act.

Section 3 of the bill also changes current law by permitting the seizure of property at the time the indictment or information is filed. Under current law the government is required to state in the indictment or information that forfeiture is sought, Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure 7(e). However, seizure of such property is only authorized upon conviction. 18 U.S.C. 1963(c).

Section 4: Amends section 1963 of title 18 by setting forth a presumption that property obtained by large-scale drug traffickers was obtained illegally and thus is subject to forfeiture. The impetus for this provision is found in H.R. 2646 (by Mr. Sawyer). This section draws upon the practice in criminal tax evasion cases of using the defendant's net worth to establish the government's case.

This amendment would create a presumption of forfeitability once the government has established, by a preponderance of the evidence, that three circumstances exist. The circumstances are that: (1) the defendant acquired the property after the alleged racketeering activity began; (2) the racketeering involved a Class I or II violation;[1] and (3) there is no likely source for the property other than the racketeering activity.

The circumstances set forth above appear to be necessary amendments to the provisions set forth in H.R. 2646 in light of various Supreme Court cases. Assistant Attorney General Lowell Jensen has indicated to the Subcommittee there must be both a rational connection between the facts proven and the conclusions inferred from that proof. In addition, there must be a legislative basis for the presumption. Insofar as the legislative record on forfeiture has only addressed the issue of large-scale drug traffickers, the presumption seems appropriately limited to those cases.

The limitations on the application of the presumption would appear to meet the objections to H.R. 2646 raised by various of the witnesses. For example, the Department of Justice witness, Edward Dennis, suggested that the presumption be limited to circumstances where the government has established that the property involved was acquired after the alleged racketeering activity began.

The provision of the proposed amendment relating to proof with respect to other possible sources for the property is derived directly from the "net worth" tax cases. Before the government may obtain a conviction of a person for tax evasion it must establish that there was no other likely explanation for the income. Davis v. United States, 226 F.2d 331 (6th Cir. 1955). This approach has proven workable in the tax area. There is also some indication that the Supreme Court would look with disfavor on a less rigorous test. Holland v. United States, 348 U.S. 121, 125-9 (1954).

The consequences of this presumption are straightforward. Once the government has met its burden of proof with respect to the three circumstances the trier of fact is permitted to find that property is subject to forfeiture. Any attempt to mandate forfeiture upon proof of the facts set forth in proposed section 1963(d) would raise very serious constitutional problems. Both Assistant Attorney General Jensen and Professor Rothstein (in testimony before the Subcommittee) point out that any such mandatory presumption would probably run afoul of the Supreme Court's decision in Ulster County Court, New York v. Allen, 442 U.S. 140 (1979).

Section 4 of the bill also contains three significant procedural changes from current law. Subsection (f) provides that if any transfer of property was made with knowledge, or reason to know, that the transfer was being made to avoid forfeiture, then such transfer is void. Under current law the government must rely on various State statutes against fraudulent transfers to avoid transactions of this type. United States v. One 1967 Chris-Craft 27 Foot Fiber Glass Boat, 423 F.2d 1293 (5th Cir. 1970); U.S. v. Currency Totalling $48,318.08, 609 F.2d 210, 213.4 (5th Cir. 1980). Enactment of this uniform Federal rule would help prevent sham transfers made solely for the purpose of evading criminal forfeiture. In addition, this section protects the rights of bona fide purchasers for value.

Subsection (g) of section 4 provides that a person who is convicted of a RICO violation cannot buy back the property he or she forfeited. The original purpose of the criminal forfeiture provisions, and indeed of the whole Act, was to prevent the infiltration of legitimate businesses by organized crime. Assuming the continued validity of that purpose it seems to make no sense to allow the continued involvement in a legitimate business of a convicted racketeer by allowing him or her to buy back the forfeited property. The effect of this subsection would be to preclude the result of the Huber case where a convicted white collar criminal repurchased, after conviction of a mail fraud related RICO violation, his interest in some hospital. United States v. Huber, 603 F.2d 387, 397 (2nd Cir. 1979); See also United States v. Barone, Cr. No. 78-185-CR-WHH (S.D. Fla. Oct. 17,

Finally, subsection (h) of section 4 of the bill provides that any criminal forfeiture action under this section may be the basis of a motion to seek a staff of any pending civil forfeiture action with respect to the same property. This appears to be the result that courts normally reach under current law. U.S. Department of Justice Drug Enforcement Administration, "Drug Agent's Guide to Forfeiture of Assets," at 233 (1981). This provision was recommended by the Department of Justice, which feared that defendants would use the discovery authorized in the civil forfeiture case to require production of non-Jencks material relative to the criminal case.

Section 5: Amends section 1964 by authorizing the courts to enter restraining orders preventing the transfer of property that is, or may be, the subject of a forfeiture proceeding. Current law, 18 U.S.C. 1963(b), authorizes the issuance of a restraining order after indictment. The courts have divided on the question of the government's burden of proof.[2] Because this relief is drastic and occurs before arrest or indictment, and can affect the rights of innocent third parties, the government is required by this section of the bill to make the same kind of showing that is required in cases involving a civil preliminary injunction.

The Department of Justice suggested that a restraint on transfer provisions be added to the bill. Their recommendation included a suggestion that such relief could be without notice to the affected parties. The bill does not, however, allow for ex parte applications for this type of relief for several reasons. First, the bill authorizes the seizure of the property at the time of the filing of an indictment or information. Thus, the only cases where this section would come into play would be before an indictment or information had been filed. Second, any transfers made to avoid forfeiture are voidable by the court. Third, there is a line of Supreme Court cases that can be read to require, as a matter of due process, prior notice and opportunity to be heard before such substantial interference with property rights is allowed.[3] Memphis Light, Gas & Water Division v. Craft, 98 S. Ct. 1554 (1978); Fuentes v. Shevin, 92 S. Ct. 1983 (1972); and Tarlow, at 300-4.

Section 6: Amends section 848 of title 21 to allow the government to seek the criminal forfeiture of the profits or proceeds of a person convicted of operating a continuing criminal enterprise. This amendment parallels the one made in section 2 of the bill with respect to 18 U.S.C. 1963.

Section 7: Amends section 848 to require that civil forfeiture actions are stayed by the initiation of a criminal forfeiture action under section 848 with respect to the same property. This amendment parallels one made earlier in the bill with respect to 18 U.S.C. 1963.

Section 8: Amends section 881 of title 21 to permit the civil forfeiture of land and buildings used, or intended to be used, for holding or storage of dangerous drugs. Current law is unclear as to whether warehouses or other buildings can be forfeited. Current law only reaches "containers". The Justice Department is worried that a defendant may claim that a warehouse is not a container. This amendment resolves that concern.

Section 9: Amends section 881 to create a Drug Enforcement Fund. This amendment does not actually create such a fund, because an appropriation act is required after this bill is enacted.

The idea of a revolving fund was taken from the suggestions of Congressman Gilman (H.R. 2910) and Congressman Sawyer (H.R. 2646). Similar funds are found in the recent reform of the Patent Office, Public Law 96-517, and with respect to certain fisheries funds. The proposed fund has a ten million dollar ceiling.

The source of the money for the fund would be the proceeds returned to the government as the result of forfeiture actions. The ostensible reason for the creation of this fund is to encourage the Drug Enforcement Administration to more aggressively pursue forfeiture actions. In theory the fund would be an addition to the agency's regular appropriation and would, therefore, serve as a reward for increased forfeiture activities.

The fund authorized by this section allows the Attorney General to spend the money set aside for any drug law enforcement purpose. Some of the previous legislative proposals have limited the use of the fund to the purchase of evidence or information (H.R. 2910) or to use by State and local law enforcement officials (H.R. 2646). This bill does not include these limits, because it seemed more appropriate to permit the Attorney General to resolve these issues.

Section 10: Amends twelve sections of title 21 drug offenses by increasing the maximum criminal fines. The new maximum fine levels were derived in large part from the scale used in the version of the proposed criminal code approved by the Committee last Congress. See section 3502 of H.R. 6915 and H. Rept. 96-1396 at 465-9. In some instances the maximum fines exceed one million dollars in order to maintain the penalty structure of the existing statute (i.e. to allow for a penalty twice as large for a second offense).

The rationale for the amendments relating to fine levels is straightforward. To many drug traffickers the costs associated with the criminal justice system are merely a cost of doing business. These amendments attempt to raise the ante. While changes in the law with respect to forfeiture are desirable, they may not permit the government to deter criminal conduct sufficiently. As numerous witnesses before various Congressional committees have clearly established, the use of forfeiture procedures is very cumbersome and time consuming. Money is difficult to trace in forfeiture cases. In procedural questions with respect to the rights of innocent third parties. Resolution of these procedural problems may make forfeiture actions even more complex. Thus, the availability of higher fines will offer yet another weapon to the government in its efforts to take the profit out of crime.

This section of the bill also adds two new sections that authorize the court to impose an alternative fine equal to twice the gross pecuniary gain derived from the offense. One of the new sections sets forth procedures for the imposition of such fines, including considerations to be used by the court in determining the amount of the fine, time schedule for payment and method of payment. The procedures set forth in the proposed new section 414 are derived from the House version of the proposed criminal code. See House Report 96-1396 at 467-8.

Section 11: Amends three sections of title 21 to increase the maximum amount that may be imposed as a criminal fine. This section also authorizes the court to use an alternative means of setting the fine to be imposed.

Section 12: Establishes the effective date for the legislation as October 1, 1982. This date was chosen to avoid problems with the Budget Act.●

[2] In United States v. Mandel, 408 F. Supp. 679 (D. Md. 1976), rev'd on other grounds, 602 F.2d 653 (4th Cir. 1979) (en banc) the court required the government to meet requirements similar to those set forth in the proposed amendment. The court in United States v. Bello, 470 F. Supp. 723 (S.D. Calif. 1979), reached a contrary result. The Bello court granted the requested restraining order despite the fact that it interfered with a defendant's right to freely choose counsel. United States v. Scalzitti, 408 F. Supp. 1014 (W.D. Pa. 1975), appeal dismissed, 556 F.2d 569 (3rd Cir. 1977).

[3] The Supreme Court in Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co., 416 U.S. 663 (1974), held that a Puerto Rico statute authorizing in rem forfeitures did not require a prior hearing. The novelty of criminal forfeitures, which are in personam in nature, makes the applicability of Calero to such statutes unclear. Compare United States v. Scharf 551 F.2d 1124, 1126 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 824 (1979) (dicta, court authorizes ex parte restraining orders) with United States v. Mandel, supra.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

SOVIETS REMEMBER FORRESTAL IN ASSESSING U.S. DEFENSE BUILDUP

HON. LARRY McDONALD
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 27, 1982

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, James V. Forrestal was our first Secretary of Defense and perhaps our best, in my view. Then Secretary Forrestal (1947-49) correctly assessed the Soviet threat and wanted to orient our defenses to meet that challenge. In attempting to make his case, he ran into a stone wall of policymakers who were convinced that the Soviets would behave if we just did something additionally nice for them—some who were naive and some who were high in Government and working for the other side, as later events were to reveal. However, swimming against the tide, Forrestal was considered controversial and the strange circumstances of his death did not diminish the controversy. However, if a man is known by his enemies, the Soviets have neither forgotten nor forgiven Forrestal for opposing them.

Mr. Louis M. Hohlmeier, Washington editor of Financier, discusses Forrestal in the January 1982 issue of the Financier, pointing out that the Soviets recently compared him to Secretary Weinberger, and how they fear a buildup of our defenses. The article follows:

SOVIETS REMEMBER FORRESTAL IN ASSESSING U.S. DEFENSE BUILDUP

(By Louis M. Hohlmeier)

In the year that has passed since Ronald Reagan became President and promised more guns and no less butter, Mr. Reagan has been educated to the enormous difficulty of increasing Defense spending substantially while at the same time reducing taxes significantly and cutting domestic spending only modestly. Now, as he prepares to address Congress on the State of the Union, looming Budget deficits raise large questions concerning the future of tax policy and spending levels, but in the broad domestic area, and not in Defense.

At some unremarked moment within the past few years, the U.S. recovered sufficiently from the military and political trauma of Viet Nam to begin thinking that Defense spending was not necessarily bad, and patriotism was not passe. Defense spending began to rise when Jimmy Carter was President, and the Democrats controlled both Houses of Congress.

Its pace has quickened under Mr. Reagan, with Democrats and Republicans in full agreement in principle on its direction: Up.

Political and popular perceptions of the threat posed by the Soviet Union to the U.S. are changing—and they involve more than a departure from the anti-military, anti-war movements of the Viet Nam period, however.

To a remarkable extent, the Communist and non-Communist or anti-Communist worlds remain as divided as they were four decades ago by the events of World War II and the Cold War.

But new tensions are growing in those old divisions, and U.S. perceptions of the Soviet threat may well be subject to change more radical than any since the end of World War II.

A funny thing happened in Moscow several months ago when the Department of Defense in Washington released its new and widely publicized study titled Soviet Military Power.

It described the Soviet military buildup in some detail, with full-color pictures of Russian missiles, tanks, ships and planes. "For the past quarter century," Defense Secretary Caspar W. Weinberger said in a preface, "we have witnessed the continuing growth of Soviet military power at a pace that shows no signs of slackening in the future. . . The greatest defense forces in the world are those of free people in free nations well informed as to the challenge they face, firmly united in their resolve to provide fully for the common defense, thereby deterring aggression and safeguarding the security of the world's democracies."

Pravda called the study a "routine fabrication;" that reaction was hardly surprising. The obvious intent of the study was to promote popular and political support in the U.S. and abroad for the Reagan Administration's buildup of U.S. military power.

The next day, however, Pravda launched into a strong attack on Mr. Weinberger. It called his study an "outpouring of irresponsible claptrap," and accused him of "propagandistic hysteria." It compared him with James V. Forrestal, who, Pravda said, "is known to have come to a bad end" because of his "anti-Soviet hallucinations."

REVELATION OF FEAR

That was a remarkable comparison for the Russians to draw, not necessarily because it is inaccurate but because it is one that few Americans have drawn. Mr. Forrestal is all but forgotten in the U.S.—but obviously is well remembered in the Soviet Union, or at least in the Kremlin. The comparison drawn by Pravda unintentionally illustrates the grave Soviet fear of a U.S. military buildup.

If Americans have forgotten, Soviet military leaders well remember that Mr. Forrestal, previously an investment banker on Wall Street, became the most articulate spokesman within the Roosevelt and Truman Cabinets of the viewpoint that the Soviet Union was bent on world aggression that could not be stopped except with U.S. military power.

He was President Franklin Roosevelt's Secretary of the Navy, and became the nation's first Secretary of Defense under President Harry S. Truman, but his viewpoint was not popular, and it did not prevail.

He was an anti-Communist even when the U.S. was allied with the Soviet Union in the war against Germany—a time when the popular wish was to believe in the peaceful postwar intentions of the Russians.

When the war was over, public opinion in America demanded immediate demobilization, and Mr. Truman, inexperienced in the ways of war or peace, tried mightily to accommodate that demand. Military spending was reduced so quickly and drastically that he was able to balance the Federal Budget in 1947, 1948, and 1949.

After the 1948 election, Mr. Truman dismissed Mr. Forrestal for political rather than military reasons, and Mr. Forrestal shortly thereafter took his own life, apparently blaming himself for having failed to convince his President of the magnitude of the threat of Soviet military power.

Mr. Forrestal was one of the larger enigmas of U.S. history. He could not be explained by the Democratic Presidents who employed him and promoted him, so he was more or less forgotten. But he apparently is still remembered well in the Soviet Union.

Pravda's comparison of Mr. Forrestal to Mr. Weinberger is of course inaccurate and misleading. Mr. Forrestal was an intense and unquestionably brilliant man who lived at a time when the U.S. was embroiled in its own fierce and emotional debate over the intentions of the Soviet Union and the meanings of Communism.

IN VITAL RESPECTS, THE SAME

Mr. Weinberger, on the other hand, may be no less brilliant, but he also is no fatalist. His world is very different from that of Mr. Forrestal, yet time may prove the comparison drawn by Pravda to be not entirely inaccurate. The world has changed, but in vital respects it has remained remarkably the same.

But change may well be at hand, in part because Mr. Reagan is President and Mr. Weinberger is Secretary of Defense, and in part because it is developing new and fearsome tensions within and without the orbit of Soviet military power.

If history is prologue, the awful strains inside Communist Poland are portentous. Germany cannot forever remain divided between East and West. Those old tensions left behind in Eastern Europe and the Far East by World War II and the Cold War are made more ominous by new ones the Soviet Union has created by its aggressions in the Middle East, Africa, and Latin America.

With the benefit of 40 years of hindsight, one can conclude without great difficulty that U.S. foreign and military policy vis-a-vis the Soviet Union have been, in the Washington vernacular, a mess.

To make that charge is to imply that the Democrats and liberal Republicans who served as Presidents, until Mr. Reagan's election, were responsible for it. But that implication is without foundation.

CONSERVATIVES SHARE BLAME

The conservative Republicans, for example, during Mr. Truman's time, were demanding instant demobilization and a balanced Budget even as they were condemning Godless Russian Communism.

Such are the paradoxical inefficiencies of politics in a popular democracy, as compared with the political efficiency of totalitarianism.

● This "bullet" symbol identifies statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor.

Unfortunately, however, history is prologue. The postwar history of Soviet-U.S. relations normally is dated from that time in 1947 when Mr. Truman finally decided the Russians were not to be trusted, and enunciated the Truman Doctrine for containment of Communism in Greece and Turkey. But by then the Russians controlled all of Eastern Europe, including Poland.

The containment policy was meaningless to Eastern Europe, and the military posture of the U.S. was such that the Soviet Union could have crushed the American policy in Greece and Turkey also.

Mr. Truman, shortly after he was unexpectedly and unwillingly thrust into the Presidency upon the death of Mr. Roosevelt, declared that "Peace is hell." He tried to pursue his predecessor's policies without knowing precisely what those policies were—if indeed Mr. Roosevelt himself had known what his postwar policies might have been.

POWER LOW, BUDGET BALANCED

He watched helplessly while China fell to Communism. When finally, for the first time since World War II, he decided that Communism had to be contained with American military power, U.S. military strength was at its lowest ebb in several years—during which time, however, he had balanced the Budget.

But Mr. Truman went into Korea expecting the containment of Communism to require no more than a police action, unworthy of a declaration of war.

When the Korean and Chinese Communists proved otherwise, there followed an acrimonious debate between Mr. Truman and General Douglas MacArthur over American foreign and military policy; the result was a stalemate arranged by President Dwight Eisenhower after Mr. Truman's unpopularity cost the Democrats control of the White House and Congress.

If Korea was a stalemate, as an exercise in Communist containment, Viet Nam was a military and political disaster—an American tragedy appreciated by the Kremlin in many ways.

The anti-war, anti-military movement that shook the country were led by young radicals, but Viet Nam's legacy swept the whole nation and profoundly affected foreign and military policy. Defense spending fell sharply after President Lyndon Johnson was ridden from office, and Richard Nixon became President. By 1975, the Defense budget, measured in constant dollars, was no more than it had been in 1955.

NEVER QUITE DECIDED

In sum, the only consistency in U.S. policy for four decades has been inconsistency and improvisation. Ever since the Soviet Union emerged from World War II as the only world power rivaling the U.S. the U.S. has never quite decided what to make of it.

The improvisations of Mr. Truman and his successor Presidents obviously were not complete failures. Greece and Turkey did not fall to Communism, although that happy result seems to have flowed less from U.S. military conviction than from the fact that Stalin's Russia was not at that time prepared militarily to extend its Eastern European conquests so far South.

The Berlin airlift preserved a U.S. presence in Germany's ancient capital when the Russians blockaded the highway, rail, and water routes to Berlin. But again, the Berlin airlift was a defensive kind of improvisation that succeeded only because the Russians did not try to blockade its particular access to the city.

In larger sum, the U.S. in the decades since World War II has concentrated on butter except on those occasions when it reluctantly and momentarily concentrated on guns.

Twice since then the U.S. has gone to war against Communist forces, but carefully has avoided war with the Soviet Union itself; and obviously during the Korean and Viet Nam Wars the U.S. did rearm itself. But except for those episodes, the long-term trend line for U.S. military preparedness since World War II has been down.

From 1955 to 1965, outlays for Defense declined from about 10% to about 7% of GNP. After Viet Nam, they fell sharply, and remained in the vicinity of 5% of GNP through almost all the 1970s.

In that same quarter-century, the Soviet Union has increased spending on what it euphemistically also calls Defense—an average 12% to 14% of their GNP.

Defense spending as a percentage of GNP is not a precise measure of any nation's ability to fight and win a war, conventional or nuclear; but it is one measure worthy of attention unless or until Russian and U.S. combat capabilities are tested against each other.

UNITED STATES LOSING LEAD

The Defense Department does not concede military superiority to the Russians. But it asserts that the U.S.S.R. in the last quarter-century has "dramatically reduced the U.S. lead in virtually every important basic technology," and that the U.S. is actually losing its lead in key sectors.

The next question, of course, concerns what the Soviet Union intends to do with its military power, and indeed what the Russians have done in the past five years and still are doing.

In its own use of military force, the U.S.S.R. historically has been respectful of U.S. military power. The possibility of war with the U.S. surely was one consideration in the Soviet decision not to challenge militarily the Truman Doctrine in Greece and Turkey, and not to shoot down American aircraft in the Berlin airlift.

Clearly, though, the Soviet Union did use military force to subjugate Eastern European nations because it was quite convinced that the U.S. would not intervene militarily there.

Of course, those military decisions were made by the Kremlin at a time when the U.S. possessed and the Soviet Union did not possess the atomic bomb.

Subsequently the Russians exploded their atomic bomb, and they now have acquired a nuclear arsenal, but they still have not started what in the Kremlin might be called a preventive war. The Kremlin has been and surely is anxious to avoid the debilitating costs of nuclear war.

POLITICAL GAINS WITHOUT WAR

It adds to its arsenals of nuclear and conventional weapons in the belief that, as it gains military strength looking toward military superiority, its political objectives will be served without resort to war with the United States.

The Soviet military buildup has facilitated not only the strengthening of Warsaw Pact forces in Eastern Europe, but has also enabled the Russians to send arms and military advisers to Algeria, Libya, Angola, Ethiopia, Iraq, Syria, and South Yemen. Military aid has made surrogates of East Germany, North Korea, and most spectacularly Cuba.

Those are some of the manifestations of Soviet military power that 12% to 14% of Soviet GNP has bought in the past quarter-century, and those are some of the manifestations of Soviet power that prompted the Democrats, when they controlled the White House and Congress, to begin spending more on Defense very late in the '70s.

In the last year he was President, Mr. Carter proposed for fiscal 1981 an increase of almost 7% in Defense spending; only four years earlier in the U.S. and its NATO allies had agreed on a 3% growth target.

Those manifestations of Soviet power that spread from Cuba to Mozambique to North Korea may not represent the most serious threats to world peace, however.

For the Soviet Union and its Warsaw Pact allies in Europe have created profound difficulties for themselves and potentially for the U.S. by spending great sums on guns and relatively small sums on butter. They have sustained high levels of military expenditures at the cost of deteriorating economies over the past decade.

In so allocating their resources, the Communist nations have invited domestic troubles in the form of food shortages, low labor productivity, transportation snarls, and energy constraints.

NO LESS ON GUNS

But the totalitarian Governments of those countries quite apparently have no intention whatsoever of spending less on guns and more on butter. The workers of Poland and possibly other countries may rebel, and their rebellions will be put down with that same Communist military strength that was created to spread the blessings of Communism worldwide.

Russian-style Communism proved no blessing to China, and disaffection from Communism could spread from Poland to other countries of Eastern Europe. The Soviet's willingness to use its military power on a large scale to protect its political interests was demonstrated in a significant way in Afghanistan two years ago.

The conclusion that faces the Reagan Administration then is that Soviet military power may well represent a threat to world peace not merely in Afghanistan, Cuba, and other places that, in the world scheme, are relatively small and relatively insignificant, but also in the larger and more strategic places of Europe and the Far East.

After four decades, improvisation in U.S. foreign and military policy seems no longer adequate, if it ever was.

NO CHANCE COMPARISON

It may be by chance that Mr. Reagan is the first genuinely conservative Republican who has sat in the white House since Herbert Hoover, but it is not by chance that he has moved toward the substantially larger Defense budgets that were proposed by Mr. Carter. Nor is it by chance that the Kremlin sees a comparison between Defense Secretaries Weinberger and Forrestal.

The U.S. it appears, is entering upon a time when Communist containment will be redefined, and U.S. military power will bear some relationship to the new definition.

Military spending will continue to grow, barring a highly unlikely retreat by the Soviets from their own spending habits of the past quarter-century, and the U.S. will be required to devote more of its GNP to guns, and less to butter.

And the education of Mr. Reagan relative to domestic spending and taxes will continue.

But the future of U.S. relations with the Soviet Union might draw hope from the past. Winston Churchill in his Iron Curtain speech at Fulton, Missouri, nearly four decades ago, said that there is nothing the Soviet Union respects more than military strength, and nothing it respects less than military weakness.●

PRESIDENT'S PROGRAM WORKING

HON. DAVID DREIER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 27, 1982

● Mr. DREIER. Mr. Speaker, as Congress reacts to President Reagan's state of the Union address, I would urge my colleagues to keep one primary consideration in mind: the President's program for economic recovery is working. It was never intended to provide an instantaneous cure for our fiscal ills. We have a great deal of work to do if that program is to succeed.

During the first session of this Congress, we took major steps toward restoring fiscal stability. We trimmed some of the excess expenditures from the Federal budget and passed the largest tax cut in the history of this country.

Today, however, we must face the issue of whether the 97th Congress will be remembered for its courage and commitment in completing the important work it began or whether it will be thought of as a Congress that had a promising beginning, but failed to finish the job.

We have only begun the fight to turn our economy around. This is not the time to quit.

The tax cuts, which were implemented in the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981, must continue to take effect as scheduled. As taxes are reduced, the economy will be considerably strengthened during the years ahead. The reduction in taxes has already resulted in increased savings by Americans. If we continue along this path, we can also expect to see a substantial decrease in unemployment as incentives for risk taking and job creation begin to take hold.

We must continue to slow the growth of Federal spending. There is still much fraud and abuse in our Government which has to be eliminated. It is imperative that we not retreat from the course of cutting Federal programs which have proven records of ineffectiveness and waste while simultaneously maintaining benefits for the truly needy.

To remove the fraud and abuse from our Government and make it better able to serve the people, the President has proposed a dramatic restructuring of the relationship between the Federal Government and the States. By 1991, State and local governments will administer more than 40 programs which are now administered by the Federal Government. The States will definitely be able to administer these programs with more compassion and cost-effectiveness than any Washington bureaucrat ever has done.

After all that we have accomplished, it would be tragic, indeed, if this Congress were to back away from completing this crucial task. Clearly, the programs of the past have not worked, but the programs of the future will work if we give them a chance.●

NATURAL GAS PRICES

HON. DOUGLAS K. BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 27, 1982

● Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, as the Congress returns to resume consideration of the many weighty matters on its agenda for the second session, the Reagan administration has stated that it will soon submit to the Congress a proposal to accelerate the decontrol of natural gas prices. While there are many serious questions which must be resolved before any decision is reached on this matter, one of the most important is the effect which early decontrol will have upon those who produce the food for this Nation and for much of the rest of the world. A recent editorial published in the Fremont, Nebr., Tribune cites the cost of accelerated decontrol to America's farmers. Dependent as farmers are upon anhydrous ammonia fertilizer, the cost of which, in turn, is heavily dependent upon that of natural gas, early decontrol will have a devastating impact upon the farmer's ability to make a profit. In these times of economic distress on the farm, it is imperative that this issue be addressed before the Congress acts on these proposals, and I urge my colleagues to read the following article which further reflects on this issue:

[From the Fremont (Nebr.) Tribune, Dec. 15, 1981]

ACCELERATED GAS DECONTROL OPPOSED

Farmers, already beleaguered by record low grain prices and record high production costs, now face another congressional measure that would strain even further the delicate agriculture economy.

Congress now is considering an accelerated natural gas price decontrol plan that would increase farm production costs and take an enormous bite out of farm income. The proposal, if approved, eventually would affect consumers as well and should be vigorously opposed.

The accelerated decontrol plan is supported by wellhead producers of natural gas and is opposed by natural gas distributors and suppliers.

A study done by the Citizen-Labor Energy Coalition shows that accelerated decontrol would increase production costs for farmers by $8.2 billion in the next three years. Nebraska farmers alone would absorb $417 million in increased costs, the study says.

Most of the additional costs would come in the form of anhydrous ammonia fertilizers. Presently, nitrogen fertilizer costs about $250 a ton, but the study says accelerated decontrol would push it to $620 a ton by 1984, adding more than 26 cents to the cost of producing a bushel of corn. Additional price factors would be residential energy, production of electricity, irrigation and propane expenses.

If Congress and the Reagan administration are intent on satisfying wellhead producers by accelerating natural gas decontrol, a closer examination of its effect on farmers and subsequent food costs is called for. Decontrol might be the ticket to ensure an adequate supply of natural gas but it must not be at the expense of farmers.

Its effect goes far beyond the fields, silos and elevators of Nebraska. The proportion of income Americans spend on food still is one of the lowest in the world. But the more economic pressures put on farmers to increase production while returns decrease, the more expensive food will become.

Corn prices have the biggest effect on the price of meat, especially red meats like beef. And beef today is getting so expensive Americans are foresaking it for alternatives like fish, pork and fowl. Cattle and cattlemen are becoming an endangered species, and accelerated gas decontrol would be another nail in their coffin.

By protecting the economy of the farmers, Americans are protecting their own personal economy.

Maybe citizens won't yell loud enough until they are forced to pay $10 a pound for hamburger and $5 for a dozen eggs. But by then it may be too late.●

CLEMSON TIGERS ARE NO. 1

HON. CARROLL A. CAMPBELL, JR.

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 27, 1982

● Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, this week representatives of the Clemson Tigers, the No. 1 college football team in the Nation, are visiting Washington. As a South Carolinian, I would like to take this opportunity to welcome these outstanding men and recognize their accomplishments.

Coming off a six and five season last year, the Tigers showed a determination and dedication this season that is truly noteworthy. They ended the 1981 season as the only undefeated team from a major school. During the season, they defeated three teams ranked in the top 10 and produced three All-Americans. Head Coach Danny Ford, at the age of 33, was the youngest coach-of-the-year ever chosen. And, on New Year's Day, the Clemson Tigers defeated a fine team from Nebraska to become the No. 1 team in the Nation.

We in South Carolina are justifiably proud of Clemson University and the fine young people it produces. In fact, this week has been proclaimed "Clemson is No. 1" week in our State by the Governor. However, Clemson's recognition is not limited to South Carolina. The highlight of their representatives' visit this week will be a meeting with a former sportscaster from Des Moines, Iowa, who has done pretty well for himself also. It won't be the first time a football player has been to the White House, but I'm very sure they have never had such an influx of tiger paws before.●

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. JOHN M. ASHBROOK

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, last Sunday thousands of patriotic Ukrainian Americans celebrated their independence day. I was privileged to speak to one of these moving ceremonies at Parma, Ohio and share with these fine patriots some of my views. Solidarity has a new meaning. The Polish workers reminded us that the free world, indeed their Eastern European brothers and sisters, were silent when the Baltic States were ruthlessly annexed over 40 years ago. The Hungarian freedom fighters fought alone in 1956, the Czechoslovakian patriots in 1968 and now we realize what many of us have said all along—the loss of freedom anywhere is the loss of freedom to all of us.

The Ukrainian people in particular have been victims of brutal Nazi and Communist repression. The Communists slaughtered some 11,000 Ukrainians at Vinnista at the same time their Polish brothers were being massacred at Katyn Forest in Poland.

Mr. Speaker, the anniversary celebrated by the Ukrainians in the free world each January has a meaningful significance not only for the Ukrainians but for the people of the United States and the whole free world as well. It is obvious that when freedom is obliterated in one country, it indirectly affects all the other free peoples. At a time when Moscow tries to impress the world as the champion of anticolonialism, there is an urgent need to remind our people of the fate of nations forced to live under the brutal oppression of Communist dictatorship.

Ukraine with a population of over 50 million was the first victim of Soviet Russian aggression. It is the largest non-Russian Nation within the Soviet Russian Empire. This entitles her to rank in Europe next to Russia, Germany, and France not only in terms of population, but also in terms of strategic geographic position and rich resources. Because of her resources, it had always been regarded as a coveted prize of aggressors—first the Mongols, then Moscovite Tsars and finally the Russian Communists.

When, in 1917, the Russian autocratic government disintegrated, the Ukrainian people availed themselves of the opportunity to regain their own independence. A national government was formed which then issued decrees and promulgated laws, securing liberty and equality for all citizens of Ukraine. At the same time, the Russian Communist Party issued its declaration in favor of the right to self-determination. It soon became apparent, however, that this Soviet declaration was only a clever Bolshevik maneuver to preserve the unity of the former Russian Empire. Simultaneously with the ostentatious proclamation of the right to self-rule, the Soviet Russian Government dispatched to the Ukrainian National Government a 48-hour ultimatum dated December 17, 1917, signed by Lenin and Stalin, demanding unconditional surrender and the acceptance of Soviet Russian domination over Ukraine. The reply by the Ukrainian Government of December 19, 1917, is regarded today as a historical and a classic document which clearly exhibits a unique comprehension of the potential Communist threat not only to the young Ukrainian Republic, but to the free peoples throughout the world. Ukrainians realized already in 1917 that between the czarist and the Bolshevik imperialism, there was little or no difference. Rejecting the Soviet ultimatum, Ukraine proclaimed her independence on January 22, 1918. The proclamation of the reunification of all Ukrainian territories in one single democratic state followed a year later on January 22, 1919. With these two significant acts, the Ukrainians demonstrated to the world that Moscow and Kiev represented two different nations, and two different mentalities. Kiev personified the democratic concept of government based on respect for human rights and the dignity of man, while Moscow represented not only totalitarianism but also a godless force of destruction.

The ensuing Russian-Ukrainian war of almost 4 years' duration (1917-21) is rather obscured, because at that time communism was not recognized as a danger to the free world. The Russian Communists were aided in their war against Ukrainians by a majority of the Russians who sacrificed democracy in order to preserve the unity of the Russian Empire.

Since the Bolshevik Russian occupation of Ukraine, more than 10 million Ukrainians died in the defense of their independence. Ukraine would have remained free had the Western nations paid heed to her warnings of the potential Communist menace and answered her desperate call for moral and military assistance. Without Ukraine's strategic position and her immeasurable mineral resources the Soviet Russian Government would have difficulties in initiating aggressive pressures toward the West. We, Americans, should find comfort in knowing that the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics is not all Russia, but a group of captive nations yearning for an opportunity to break this chain of bondage and become masters of their destinies within their respective Republics. During and after World War II, the Ukrainian Insurgent Army (UPA), reaffirming the will of Ukrainian people to sovereignty, was actively engaged in fighting nazism and communism alike. Paradoxically, the Western Powers again were not interested in the emergence of this freedom force in Eastern Europe, and unwittingly helped the Kremlin pave its way to the heart of Europe and Asia. On the basis of our experience with the Communists, we should know by now that the only policy capable of shaking the foundations of the Soviet Russian slave empire is a policy motivated by the idea of individual and national liberty for all. It is this ideological weapon the Communists fear most. For this reason, the Ukrainians would wholeheartedly support the U.S. ideological reorientation which would include an open support for Ukraine's as well as for other nations' rights to liberty and independence. Such a policy would force the Kremlin into a defensive position and may prove to be the best deterrent to a global war.●

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the House's attention the 64th anniversary of Ukrainian Independence Day. It is indeed fitting that the Congress should pay tribute to the aspirations and hope for freedom of the Ukrainian people.

On January 22, 1918, the Ukrainian National Republic proclaimed its independence from foreign power, and its existence as a free and democratic state. While the Ukraine was soon thereafter crushed by the Soviet Red Army, the proclamation was then, as it is now, a symbol of the Ukrainian nation's courage and commitment to freedom.

As a free country, the United States must continue to show it is not indifferent to the cause of freedom in other countries. We must not forget those in nations held captive by the U.S.S.R., whose cultural, religious, and political rights are systematically denied. Recently, our attention has been centered on another captive nation, Poland. Like Poland, the Ukraine has continually struggled under the yoke of her Russian neighbor. Martial law in Poland makes us all the more aware of the cruel repression practiced by the Soviets in the captive Eastern European countries, and makes Ukrainian Independence Day all the more significant, not just to Americans of Ukrainian origins, but to all Americans who treasure their freedom and who respect the desire for freedom of others.

As the new year commences, we must all renew our pledge to support the cause of freedom in the Ukraine and throughout the world.●

HIGH INTEREST IS NO INFLATION SOLUTION

HON. AL SWIFT

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 27, 1982

● Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Speaker, last night the President expressed concern for the plight of lumberjacks in the Northwest and then reaffirmed his strong support for continuing a policy of high-interest rates. That is the very policy that has caused the lumberjack's problems.

But it is not just the loggers who are hurting. From loggers to sawmills to lumberyards to homebuilders to real estate, the high-interest-rate policy is a killer. The unemployment rates tell a tragic tale for States like Washington and Oregon which have a major wood products base to their economies.

But the effects of this policy do not even stop there. Auto dealers, farmers, thrift institutions—virtually all small businesses are facing serious problems which end all too often with bankruptcy.

It is a devastating policy.

And that view was reinforced recently in an interview by U.S. News & World Report. It was an unlikely source of criticism of the administration. The President, it was said, "should pressure the Federal Reserve to bring interest rates down. High rates will not solve our inflation problem."

The source of that advice was the administration's economic guru, Dr. Arthur Laffer, exponent of supply-side economics and a member of the Economic Policy Advisory Board for the President.

Still, the policy goes on.

The determination to continue the awful policy was announced a few days ago by the Fed Chairman Volker. The President reaffirmed his enthusiastic support of that policy last night. The meaning can only be that small business is considered expendable in the fight against inflation.

That is so shortsighted.

We do not have to resort to a profligate policy of wildly printing money to correct things. We do not need to swing from the present extreme to that extreme which the defenders of high interest rates always haul out as the strawman in this debate.

Small business needs some wiggle room—some relaxation of interest rates—in order to survive this period of economic difficulty. It continues to be one of the great mysteries of our time why that prudent relief cannot be given to those millions of businesses that are fighting a losing battle of survival under the present rigid and inflexible policy.●

GET US OUT

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 27, 1982

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, it is seldom that an editorial contains so much information of substance on one subject. However, several dozen copies of one editorial have been sent to me from the Rolla Daily News of Rolla, Mo. The subject is the United Nations, and the editorial writer is Edward W. Sowers. Mr. Sowers demonstrates clearly the growing disillusionment, as well as outright condemnation, by the American public of the United Nations.

Mr. Sowers cites an excellent secondary source for information; namely, Robert W. Lee's "The United Nations Conspiracy." I recommend this book highly to my colleagues. Mr. Sowers calls attention to the fact of only two Senators voting against acceptance of the original United Nations Charter. Sad as it is to observe, this absolute minority was right. Maybe my colleagues will now pay heed and realize that, as Mr. Sowers suggests, and I wholeheartedly concur, it is high time to: "Get US Out!" Mr. Sowers editorial of December 31, 1981, follows:

[From the Rolla (Mo.) Daily News, Dec. 13, 1981]

UNITED NATIONS CONSPIRACY

(By Edward W. Sowers)

The United Nations, for three and one-half decades, has been indulging in a gigantic and unfettered conspiracy—mostly at U.S. taxpayers' expense—to enslave our free republic in a world government dominated by the Communistic Soviet Union, and its pip-squeak surrogates generally referred to as the Third World.

Having had enough of this free-wheeling conspiracy, more and more responsible officials and thinking citizens are ready for us to pull out.

A few years ago this opinion, which I share with the others, would have been regarded as unthinkable, something like condemning apple pie and motherhood. Not so today. In 1959, the Gallup Poll reported that 87 percent of the American people thought that the U.N. was doing a good job. But, on Nov. 19, 1980, a Gallup Poll reported that only 31 percent thought the United Nations was doing the job it set out to do at its inception in 1945.

What has happened to force this change. Well, time after time, the United Nations has taken pro-Soviet Communistic actions, helping only Russia and its surrogates to the detriment of the U.S. and its allies. These actions and their results are emerging from behind the cloaks of U.N. propoganda, getting into books (notably Robert W. Lee's "The United Nations Conspiracy") and is now up for offical consideration in a bill before Congress.

Yes, Congressman Larry McDonald (D-Georgia) has introduced a bill, (H.R. 3861), which would "terminate all participation by the United States in the United Nations, and to remove all privileges, exemptions and immunities of the United Nations."

U.S. Senator Robert Packwood (R-Oregon) thinks "The United Nations does not take itself seriously as a body designed to try to keep world peace, let alone world morality, and I think the time has come: Does this nation any longer belong in that body."

Meanwhile, Sen. William L. Langer (R-North Dakota) told his colleagues as early as July 28, 1945, before he was one of two senators voting against accepting the United Nations charter (treaty) that he believed the charter is fraught with danger to the American people.

Then why did the other senators overwhelmingly adopt the charter. Well, for one thing senators made up their minds before reading the charter put together by Alger Hiss, Communist, in San Francisco. World War II was just over, the senators reasoned, and the world has to bind itself united for peace. But the senators, it has turned out, made a collossal mistake, as Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Arizona) now admits:

". . . The time has come to recognize the United Nations for the anti-American, anti-freedom organization that it has become. The time has come for us to cut off all financial help, withdraw as a member, and ask the United Nations to find a headquarters that is more in keeping with the philosophy of the majority of voting members, someplace like Moscow or Peking."

Why has a man of Goldwater's knowledge and experience reached that conclusion. Well, he has observed it from his vantage point in the Senate, as the U.N. record unfolded. He saw, as even I did in Rhodesia, how the U.N. voted an embargo against that strong ally and friend of the U.S. in South Africa. How Great Britian followed suit, with the result of the solid white government led by Ian Smith fell, helped along by U.S. Secretary of State Henry Kissinger and U.N. Representative Andrew Young, and is now in the hands of Soviet Communists, who have renamed it Zinbabwe. At the head is a guerrilla named Mugabe, chief of his fellow guerrillas who shot and killed with Soviet-designed AK-47 assault rifles.

This and literally dozens of other pro-Communist accomplishments of the U.N. I've read and underlined in Author Lee's book "The United Nations Conspiracy." The case with Rhodesia I experienced first-hand with a trip there in 1974, but Lee's book documents other U.N. "achievements" happening since. And they are still happening since the book went to press. In this week's Wall Street Journal, a reporter from the Journal writing from Southwest Africa states the U.N. is about to force the Southwest African government out from under the protective wing of South Africa and into the hands of Marxist guerrillas.

When one looks back at the leaders of the U.N. why shouldn't it take pro-communist action, Alger Hiss, chief architect of the charter, notorious Communist, Trygve Lie, second Secretary General, a Norweigian Socialist whose country was subject to Soviet reprisals and thus influenced by Soviet extortion; Dag Hammarskjold, a Swedish oneworlder, backed by the Soviet, who once said, "I have a strong feeling that I am a new Jesus." The next one, U Thant, a Burmese Marxist, strongly supported by the Soviet again and again for re-election. U Thant, after concluding the U.N.'s bloody war against black-ruled, anti-Communist Katanga, he turned his attention to the white-rule, anti-Communist regimes in South Africa and Rhodesia. The U.N. gave $10,000,000 of UNICEF Halloween funds to fight its unholy war on the Congo. Under Thant's leadership, Rhodesia became (on Dec. 16, 1966) the target of the first economic sanctions ever voted by the United Nations. He later resisted the economic boycott of Communist Cuba. Later, he called for the cessation of bombing in North Vietnam and led the U.S. commanders to give up the "no win" war, leading General Clark to observe this is the first time in the history of the U.S. to sign an armistice without victory.—But it was another victory for the U.N. The next one, Kurt Waldheim, once goosestepped with Hitler's legions. With a swastika on his collar, he accommodated Austria's neighbor, Czechoslovakia, as it was taken over by the Soviet Communists. In more recent years, he followed U Thant's approval of the slaughter by Chairman Mao of millions in old China, then helped expel Taiwan (New China), and take in Communist China.

Thus far, as I have pointed out, the United Nations has been headed by a Soviet spy, two self-proclaimed Socialists, a Burmese Marxist and a former Nazi foot soldier—each Secretary-General to date has been an aggressive enemy of limited government and free enterprise economics. What else could come from the U.N. than pro-Communist actions and moves toward One-World Government. That I don't want. Do you? They take up the solgan, "Get US Out!"●

DON ALGIE—OUTSTANDING CITIZEN

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 27, 1982

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to George Donald Algie who was honored as the outstanding citizen by the North Torrance (Calif.) Lions Club last Sunday. I heartily concur in the Lions Club's selection, for Don Algie is one of those persons who, without seeking recognition or notoriety, are the strong basis for a good community.

Born in Moline, Ill., in 1917, Donald and his family moved to Eaglerock, Calif., in 1920. After graduating from Eaglerock High School, he attended Glendale College. In 1947, Don became owner and publisher of the Gardena Valley News, a community newspaper with a history of more than 77 years of quality journalism. Largely under Don's leadership, the News has grown to be one of the finest community newspapers in the country. Don has held his position as owner-publisher ever since.

Mr. Speaker, it seems that dissatisfaction is all too common these days—dissatisfaction with one's job, one's family, one's life. People are changing jobs, and sometimes even occupations, much more often than people used to; people are moving from city to city; the divorce statistics, of course, are very high. I am always pleased, therefore, to see a man such as Don, who has held the same position for 35 years, has a beautiful family, and a happy, content place in his community.

Don's other interests include participation in the Gardena Kiwanis Club, the Gardena Elks Lodge, the Masonic Order, and the YMCA. At the latter, he has served as a judo instructor.

My wife, Lee, joins me in wishing only the best in the coming years to Don, his wife Sheila, and their two sons, Steve and Dennis.●

TRIBUTE TO ROOSEVELT

HON. CHRISTOPHER H. SMITH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 27, 1982

● Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, perhaps no other town in our Nation epitomizes more the era of Franklin Roosevelt than the quaint but distinguished borough of Roosevelt, N.J. This town was initiated in the thirties by a group of garment workers who dreamed of a rural community to be created around a garment factory. Lending a sympathetic ear to the workers' proposals, the entire community was duly built by the Resettlement Administration using WPA labor. As a cooperative, the project later failed; but as a viable living community, the town of Roosevelt has been eminently successful.

The town of Roosevelt was the first, and perhaps the only such borough to be named for the late President Roosevelt. In the small borough park lies the only public monument to the President in the United States—a bronze head standing 6 feet in height mounted on a square marble column. It was executed by the sculptor Johnathan Shahn and cast by the Nicci brothers, the oldest bronze foundry in the world.

The painter Ben Shahn, being employed in the Resettlement Administration, was commissioned to execute a 50-foot-long fresco mural painting in the community building of the town. In this work he traced the history of the garment workers from their grim lives in the old countries through hardships as early immigrants, and on through their gradual rise toward security and well-being as an American labor force. This painting, which has been reproduced in art publications around the world, ends with the resettlement of the garment workers in the new community.

In early years, Roosevelt was much written about as one of the early examples of contemporary architecture integrated into an entire town plan. Because this small borough has been attractive to artists of various kinds, it is now the home of a dozen or so professional artists, several illustrators and composers, a notable opera singer, a playwright, several poets, a few college professors, and other professional people. The most unique and cherished part of this town, however, is its still substantial population of average working people, still dedicated to the American tradition of hard work and fair labor practices.

I want to urge all my colleagues in the House of Representatives to join with the proud people of Roosevelt and all of New Jersey in commemorating the 100th anniversary of the birth of Franklin D. Roosevelt on January 30, 1982. As we work to remedy the problems of unemployment and inflation which now limit the growth of our Nation, let us remember the dedication of President Roosevelt just before he died in 1945. In preparing a speech he was to have made, the President wrote: "The only limit to our realization of tomorrow is our doubts of today."

As we strive for a freer, stronger America in the years ahead, we should also remember those who are even now struggling for their most basic freedoms—freedoms which Americans fought and died for so many years ago. In particular, we should keep in mind the proud people of Poland, and what their courageous actions have meant for people all around the world. Let us pledge to work together—in solidarity—to protect the freedom we cherish in our homes, our workplaces, and in the world. I thank my colleagues for their consideration.●

FIGHTING CRIME: A NATIONAL PRIORITY

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 27, 1982

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington report for Wednesday, January 27, 1982, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

FIGHTING CRIME: A NATIONAL PRIORITY

Whether I am reading over the day's correspondence or answering questions at a public meeting, I am certain to see or hear expressions of concern about crime. In repeated questionnaires I have distributed in southern Indiana, fighting crime has been cited consistently as a top priority among Hoosiers.

Reports issued by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) showed that crime increased 9 percent between 1979 and 1980; violent crime increased 13 percent during the same period. This was the most significant increase in the crime index since 1975, yet these figures are based on official statistics which measure only crimes reported to the police, not unreported crimes. There is some indication that crime has increased much more dramatically than the figures indicate. A nationwide survey found that 54 percent of Americans reported that there was more crime in their neighborhoods in 1980 than during the previous year. Furthermore, the members of one in four American households experienced a physical assault or theft of property in 1980. It is hardly surprising that Hoosiers so often talk to me about crime.

Shortly after taking office last year, the Reagan Administration announced its strong commitment to ensure the domestic security of our citizens and its intention to launch a war on crime. The Attorney General selected a Task Force on Violent Crime to review the problem and make recommendations on ways the federal government could help control the crimes of murder, forcible rape, robbery, and aggravated assault while it maintained its efforts against organized and white-collar crime. However, I am concerned that no new intitiatives against crime appear to be forthcoming.

Following the issuance of the final report of the Task Force, President Reagan delivered a major speech on crime in which he endorsed many of its recommendations. He called for legal reforms to ensure the certainty of punishment, but he made no additional effort to assist state and local authorities in apprehending and jailing violent offenders. Instead, the President requested significant reductions in 1982 for the major law enforcement agencies of the federal government—the FBI, the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA), the Bureau of Prisons, and the Coast Guard. These cuts would be in addition to those made in his budget request of March 1981.

FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION

The President proposed to cut the FBI by 6 percent, a cut which would result in the loss of as many as 1,000 positions. Such a reduction would prevent the FBI from undertaking any new operations against organized and white-collar crime. For example, nothing more could be done to halt the spread of the violent motorcycle gangs in the West which finance their activities chiefly through illegal traffic in drugs. Important FBI services to state and local lawmen—such as training, laboratory examination, and fingerprint identification—would be reduced.

DRUG ENFORCEMENT ADMINISTRATION

In his speech on crime, the President stated his belief that "one of the single most important steps that can lead to a significant reduction in crime is an effective attack on drug traffic." However, he requested that the DEA be cut by 12 percent in 1982. This reduction would result in the dismissal of 434 employees, half of whom would be agents, and it would lower from 208 to 94 the number of special agents assigned to the state and local task forces which investigate major drug dealers. In addition, the DEA might be compelled to curtail training programs for state and local office and eliminate programs to prevent drug abuse.

BUREAU OF PRISONS

President Reagan proposed an additional 6 percent cut in the federal prison system at a time when the population of inmates is growing, not declining. Federal prisons are 10 percent over capacity at present. Mr. Reagan ignored the recommendation of the Task Force—$2 billion in federal funds to assist construction in state prison systems, which are approximately 30 percent over capacity. It is not possible to take dangerous offenders off the street and keep them locked up when prisons are already strained to the breaking point.

COAST GUARD

The President requested that the Coast Guard be cut by an additional 4.6 percent despite the fact that the service has a major role in intercepting drugs and enforcing laws along the nation's coasts. A full 12 percent cut similar to that made in other federal agencies would have halted the Coast Guard's efforts against drug smugglers altogether. Yet Mr. Reagan increased the Coast Guard's duties by requiring it to stop ships on the high seas if the ships appear to be transporting illegal Haitian immigrants into this country. It is hard to see how the service can be asked to do more with less.

Under our systems, the principal burden of controlling crime properly falls on state and local government. The traditional role of the federal government has been to confront the national problems—organized crime, white-collar crime, public corruption, and drug abuse—and to provide both leadership and assistance to state and local law enforcement officials. There are also areas in which federal and state authorities share the jurisdiction. I am concerned that these reductions will burden state and local police with a disproportionate share of joint responsibilities. They mean less federal help for hard-pressed state and local law enforcement officials at a time when crime and the fear of it are increasing. With my support, Congress is acting to restore some of the funds which have been cut.●

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE

HON. RAYMOND J. McGRATH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, January 26, 1982

● Mr. McGRATH. Mr. Speaker, once again we commemorate the anniversary of the Proclamation of Independence of the Ukrainian National Republic. This year, our observance is held at a time when citizens of the Ukrainian National Republic and all nations under Communist domination have witnessed the tragic events in neighboring Poland. The menacing presence of Soviet military might in all nations surrounding Poland is a grim reminder of the cost of dissension in a nation where freedom remains a distant hope.

In Ukraine, the Soviet campaign against native culture, language, religion, and other traditions continues. In spite of the consequences, thousands of courageous Ukrainians maintain their resistance to the policy of Russification and other official actions by the Soviet Government to crush individual dignity and human rights. The group formed to monitor compliance with the Helsinki Final Act has faced constant persecution, imprisonment and degradation.

To those who have kept the flame of independence burning in the Ukrainian National Republic since the brutal Communist takover in 1922, we must extend our hopes and prayers that they might join with us some day to celebrate this occasion in true freedom. I urge the Members of his body and the administration to renew their commitment to respect for human right and freedom throughout the world as we begin this session of the 97th Congress.●

A UNIQUE NEIGHBORHOOD IS PRESERVED—DITMAS PARK DESIGNATED A HISTORIC DISTRICT

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 27, 1982

● Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, those of us who are privileged to represent urban districts know that the secret of a sucessful city is a collection of good neighborhoods with different types of housing, shops, parks and community facilities. But above all such a neighborhood must have a strong sense of community identity and neighborhood pride that serves to unify its residents.

One of the jewels of a neighborhood in New York City is Ditmas Park in the 13th Congressional District which I represent. Once a part of a 17th century Dutch holding called Van Ditwarsen Farm, Ditmas Park was developed at the beginning of the 20th century as a suburban middle-class residential community by Lewis Pounds. By 1908 a Ditmas Park Association was founded to protect and enhance the area with its substantial homes of varied architectural styles and its tree-lined pleasantly laid-out streets. By 1915 Ditmas Park in Flatbush had 187 homes on nine city blocks bounded by Dorchester Road on the north; Ocean Avenue on the east with one block extending across Ocean Avenue; Newkirk Avenue on the south; and the BMT subway tracks to the west just past 16th Street.

Recently the New York City Landmarks Preservation Commission responded to the active interest, years of research, and lobbying carried on by the Ditmas Park Association, the Flatbush Historical Society, and a score of elected community officials and community activists and designated Ditmas Park as a New York City Historic District. The Commission finally recognized what Brooklynites had known for 70 years—Ditmas Park is an architectural gem and a wonderful residential area worth protecting and preserving.

This official designation is in large part a tribute to the long and hard work of many Ditmas Park volunteers, ably led by Robert J. Miller, the president of the Ditmas Park Association and his able executive committee of Dale Berson, Benadette Di Falco, Kenneth Elstein, Bea Melnick, William Richardson, and Norman Williams. Irving Chobam of the Flatbush Historical Society played a key role in documenting the planning and architectual features that make this area such a unique feat of urban planning and design. Dozens of other community residents generously donated thousands of hours in this grand effort to preserve and protect the distinctive features of their neighborhood.

I am proud to have worked along with Borough President Howard Golden, State Senator Marty Markowitz, Assemblyman Melvin Miller, and State Committee Members Jacob Gold and Joni Yoswein to see that this area received its reightful recognition for its role in New York's development and history.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that someday I might have the opportunity to show you and other Members of the House this lovely neighborhood with its colonial revival homes, its pleasant streets and magnificent shade trees, which now will be preserved in all their glory. I am proud today to pay tribute to this community and its talented and dedicted leaders with whom I have had the privilege to work with in an effort to preserve and maintain our residential neighborhoods in New York as attractive, vital, and safe places in which to live and raise a family. Neighborhoods like Ditmas Park remain a key both to our Nation's past and future greatness, and every level of our government must continue to recognize, appreciate, and support their preservation.●
